PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SIXTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, SPECIAL SESSION.

SENATE.

MONDAY, March 5, 1917.

The PRESIDENT of the Senate pro tempore (WILLARD SAULSBURY, a Senator from the State of Delaware) assumed the chair.

The Senators and Senators elect were seated to the left of the Vice President's desk.

The Speaker and Members and Members elect of the House of Representatives were announced and occupied seats to the right of the Vice President's desk, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives was escorted to a seat on the left of the Vice President's chair.

The ambassadors and ministers plenipotentiary representing foreign Governments were announced and escorted to the seats reserved for them.

The Chief Justice of the United States and the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States were announced and shown to the seats provided for them.

The Chief of Staff of the Army and the Admiral of the Navy were announced, and they with their aids were conducted to the seats assigned them.

The Committee on Arrangements of the two Houses of Congress escorted the President of the United States to the Senate Chamber and occupied the seats provided for them in the area in front of the Vice President's desk, as did also the members of the President's Cabinet.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore called the Senate to order at 12 o'clock meridian.

PRAYER.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, by Thy grace we are called together to open another session of the Senate. We pause at the threshold of this solemn duty to make mention of Thy name and to invoke Thy blessing. We offer upon Thine altar the praises of a great Nation. Thy providence has never failed us in all our national history. The storms of earth do not shake Thy throne. Thy law stands guard over the rights of men. We thank Thee to-day for the abundance of material blessing that Thou hast been pleased to bestow upon us. Thou hast given us a vision of a fair and beautiful form of civilization. By Thy power and grace alone do we hope to perpetuate the institutions that have come to us as a rich inheritance from the past.

And now we humbly beseech Thee to look upon us as we are called upon to face the trials and dangers of this tragic hour of the world's history. Bless Thy servants who are now called into places of authority and power. May they have that wisdom which justifies authority and that grace which sanctifies power. As they make and execute the laws of this land may they hold with even hand the scale of justice for all men, and may they transmute into law the highest achievements of a Christian civilization.

We pray Thy blessing upon all nations. Give to us responsive hearts to the cry for help from the stricken and starving people of all lands that are now being blasted with cruel war. May our mission among all the nations be that of self-sacrificing service, and our message be an evangel of peace and good will.

Do Thou, O God of our fathers, commission us anew this day to a place of gracious ministry among the nations of the earth which will hasten the coming of the imperial Prince of Peace. For Christ's sake. Amen.

PROCLAMATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the proclamation of the President of the United States convening the Senate in extraordinary session.

The Secretary (JAMES M. BAKER) read the proclamation, as follows:

A PROCLAMATION BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

Whereas public interests require that the Senate of the United States be convened at 12 o'clock on the 5th day of March next to receive such communications as may be made by the Executive;

Now, therefore, I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America, do hereby proclaim and declare that an extraordinary occasion requires the Senate of the United States to convene at the Capitol, in the city of Washington, on the 5th day of March next, at 12 o'clock noon, of which all persons who shall at that time be entitled to act as members of that body are hereby required to take notice.

Given under my hand and the seal of the United States at Washington the 23d of February, in the year of Our Lord 1917, and of the independence of the United States the one hundred and forty-first.

[SEAL.] WOODROW WILSON.

By the President:

ROBERT LANSING,
Secretary of State.

ADMINISTRATION OF OATH TO THE VICE PRESIDENT.

The President pro tempore administered the oath of office to THOMAS R. MARSHALL, of Indiana, Vice President elect of the United States, who responded, "I do, so help me God, in whom I believe."

ADDRESS OF VICE PRESIDENT MARSHALL.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senators, custom calls for the utterance of a few words upon this occasion. Were it otherwise, I should gladly remain silent. It may not be inappropriate to express my gratitude for the little nameless, unnumbered, and oft-times unremembered, acts of courtesy and charity shown to me by the Members of this body during the last four years; to express my regret over the vanishing faces of those who are leaving us, and to welcome those who in a few moments are to become our coworkers in the cause of constitutional freedom.

Everywhere in America are clamant and strident voices proclaiming the essential elements of patriotism. He who seeks out of them all to select one clear note of love for country may fail. I conceive it to be far more important to examine myself than to cross-examine anyone else. May I make bold to insert in the RECORD some elements of the creed which I have prepared in this period of retrospection and introspection? It does not embrace what I know, but holds part of what I believe.

I have faith that this Government of ours was divinely ordained to disclose whether men are by nature or can by education be made fit for self-government; to teach Jew and Greek, bondman and free, alike, the essential equality of all men before the law and to be tender and true to humanity everywhere and under all circumstances; to reveal that service is the highest reward of life. I can not believe otherwise than these things when I read the words and view the sacrifices of the fathers. If ours is not the golden rule of government, then Washington wrought and Lincoln died in vain.

I believe that the world, advancing now, retreating then, is nevertheless assuredly moving forward to a far-off divine event wherein the tongues of Babel will again be blended in the language of a common brotherhood; that I can reach the highest ideal of my tradition and my lineage as an American, as a man, as a citizen, and as a public official when I judge my fellowmen without malice and with charity; when I worry more about my own motives and conduct and less about the motives and conduct of others. The only time I am liable to be wrong is when I know that I am absolutely right. In an individualistic republic I am the unit of patriotism, and if I keep myself keyed up in unison with the music of the Union my fellowmen will catch the note and fall into time and step.

I believe there is no finer form of government than the one under which we live, and that I ought to be willing to live or to die as God decrees, that it may not perish from off the earth through treachery within or through assault from without; that while my first right is to be a partisan when the principles on which alone free government can rest are being strained, my first duty is to be a patriot, and in a wilderness of words to follow that clear call which bids me guard and defend the ark of our national covenant. [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

INAUGURATION OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In accordance with the usual custom and the order of the Senate the procession will now be formed for the inaugural ceremonies of the President of the United States. The Sergeant at Arms will take charge.

The President, Woodrow Wilson, accompanied by the Chief Justice of the United States, the committee on arrangements of the two Houses, the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, followed by the ambassadors of and ministers plenipotentiary from foreign countries, the Members of the Senate, preceded by the Vice President and the Secretary of the Senate, the Speaker and Clerk, followed by the Members of the House of Representatives, and the other guests of the Senate, proceeded to the inaugural platform at the east front of the Capitol.

The oath of office having been administered to the President by the Chief Justice of the United States, he delivered the following INAUGURAL ADDRESS.

MY FELLOW CITIZENS: The four years which have elapsed since last I stood in this place have been crowded with counsel and action of the most vital interest and consequence. Perhaps no equal period in our history has been so fruitful of important reforms in our economic and industrial life or so full of significant changes in the spirit and purpose of our political action. We have sought very thoughtfully to set our house in order, correct the grosser errors and abuses of our industrial life, liberate and quicken the processes of our national genius and energy, and lift our politics to a broader view of the people's essential interests. It is a record of singular variety and singular distinction. But I shall not attempt to review it. It speaks for itself and will be of increasing influence as the years go by. This is not the time for retrospect. It is time, rather, to speak our thoughts and purposes concerning the present and the immediate future.

Although we have centered counsel and action with such unusual concentration and success upon the great problems of domestic legislation to which we addressed ourselves four years ago, other matters have more and more forced themselves upon our attention, matters lying outside our own life as a nation and over which we had no control, but which, despite our wish to keep free of them, have drawn us more and more irresistibly into their own current and influence.

It has been impossible to avoid them. They have affected the life of the whole world. They have shaken men everywhere with a passion and an apprehension they never knew before. It has been hard to preserve calm counsel while the thought of our own people swayed this way and that under their influence. We are a composite and cosmopolitan people. We are of the blood of all the nations that are at war. The currents of our thoughts as well as the currents of our trade run quick at all seasons back and forth between us and them. The war inevitably set its mark from the first alike upon our minds, our industries, our commerce, our politics, and our social action. To be indifferent to it or independent of it was out of the question.

And yet all the while we have been conscious that we were not part of it. In that consciousness, despite many divisions, we have drawn closer together. We have been deeply wronged upon the seas, but we have not wished to wrong or injure in return; have retained throughout the consciousness of standing in some sort apart, intent upon an interest that transcended the immediate issues of the war itself. As some of the injuries done us have become intolerable we have still been clear that we wished nothing for ourselves that we were not ready to demand for all mankind,—fair dealing, justice, the freedom to live and be at ease against organized wrong.

It is in this spirit and with this thought that we have grown more and more aware, more and more certain that the part we wished to play was the part of those who mean to vindicate and fortify peace. We have been obliged to arm outselves to make good our claim to a certain minimum of right and of freedom of action. We stand firm in armed neutrality since it seems that in no other way we can demonstrate what it is we insist upon and can not forego. We may even be drawn on, by circumstances, not by our own purpose or desire, to a more active assertion of our rights as we see them and a more immediate association with the great struggle itself. But nothing will alter our thought or our purpose. They are too clear to be obscured. They are too deeply rooted in the principles of our national life to be altered. We desire neither conquest nor advantage. We wish nothing that can be had only at the cost of another people. We have always professed unselfish purpose and we covet the opportunity to prove that our professions are sincere.

There are many things still to do at home, to clarify our own politics and give new vitality to the industrial processes of our own life, and we shall do them as time and opportunity serve; but we realize that the greatest things that remain to be done must be done with the whole world for stage and in cooperation with the wide and universal forces of mankind, and we are making our spirits ready for those things. They will follow in the immediate wake of the war itself and will set civilization up again. We are provincials no longer. The tragical events of the thirty months of vital turmoil through which we have just passed have made us citizens of the world. There can be no turning back. Our own fortunes as a nation are involved, whether we would have it so or not.

And yet we are not the less Americans on that account. We shall be the more American if we but remain true to the principles in which we have been bred. They are not the principles of a province or of a single continent. We have known and boasted all along that they were the principles of a liberated mankind. These, therefore, are the things we shall stand for, whether in war or in peace:

That all nations are equally interested in the peace of the world and in the political stability of free peoples, and equally responsible for their maintenance;

That the essential principle of peace is the actual equality of nations in all matters of right or privilege;

That peace cannot securely or justly rest upon an armed balance of power;

That governments derive all their just powers from the consent of the governed and that no other powers should be supported by the common thought, purpose, or power of the family of nations;

That the seas should be equally free and safe for the use of all peoples, under rules set up by common agreement and consent, and that, so far as practicable, they should be accessible to all upon equal terms;

That national armaments should be limited to the necessities of national order and domestic safety;

That the community of interest and of power upon which peace must henceforth depend imposes upon each nation the duty of seeing to it that all influences proceeding from its own citizens meant to encourage or assist revolution in other states should be sternly and effectually suppressed and prevented.

I need not argue these principles to you, my fellow countrymen: they are your own, part and parcel of your own thinking and your own motive in affairs. They spring up native amongst us. Upon this as a platform of purpose and of action we can stand together.

And it is imperative that we should stand together. We are being forged into a new unity amidst the fires that now blaze throughout the world. In their ardent heat we shall, in God's providence, let us hope, be purged of faction and division, purified of the errant humors of party and of private interest, and shall stand forth in the days to come with a new dignity of national pride and spirit. Let each man see to it that the dedication is in his own heart, the high purpose of the Nation in his own mind, ruler of his own will and desire.

I stand here and have taken the high and solemn oath to which you have been audience because the people of the United States have chosen me for this august delegation of power and have by their gracious judgment named me their leader in affairs. I know now what the task means. I realize to the full the responsibility which it involves. I pray God I may be given the wisdom and the prudence to do my duty in the true spirit of this great people. I am their servant and can succeed only as they sustain and guide me by their confidence and their counsel. The thing I shall count upon, the thing without which neither counsel nor action will avail, is the unity of America—an America united in feeling, in purpose, and in its vision of duty, of opportunity, and of service. We are to beware of all men who would turn the tasks and the necessities of the Nation to their own private profit or use them for the building up of private power; beware that no faction or disloyal intrigue break the harmony or embarrass the spirit of our people; beware that our Government be kept pure and incorrupt in all its parts. United alike in the conception of our duty and in the high resolve to perform it in the face of all men, let us dedicate ourselves to the great task to which we must now set our hand. For myself I beg your tolerance, your countenance, and your united aid. The shadows that now lie dark upon our path will soon be dispelled and we shall walk with the light all about us if we be but true to ourselves—to ourselves as we have wished to be known in the counsels of the world and in the thought of all those who love liberty and justice and the right exalted.

The Senate returned to its Chamber at 1 o'clock and 14 minutes p. m., and the President pro tempore took the chair.

HOUR OF DAILY MEETING.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I submit the following resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. No. 1) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the daily hour of meeting of the Senate be 12 o'clock meridian until otherwise ordered.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 1 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 6, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 6, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come to Thee for the spiritual equipment to enable us to perform the duties of this day and of the coming days as men who fear God and who appreciate in the fullest degree the sacred responsibility of this place and of this office. With interests more precious than life itself in our hands and with a sense of our obligation to the world for clearness of discernment, for vision of possible achievement, for the exaltation of purity and righteousness—with this sense of obligation we come to Thee and pray that Thou wilt send us forth upon this day's work with Thy blessing. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings when, on request of Mr. MARTIN and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I offer a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I wish, before any action is taken that will recognize the Senate as being bound by the rules of the preceding Congress, to make the observation that while the Senate is a continuing body as an executive body it is not a continuing body as a legislative body. All the bills on the calendar died with the Sixty-fourth Congress. We have no calendar. We have no legislative committees. I wish to make the point that those rules are not binding on the new Members who come into this body, who have had no opportunity to participate in the making of the rules by which they are to be bound, and that they are not bound in the legislative functions of the Senate by the rules of any preceding Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is that a point of order?

Mr. OWEN. I make that observation for the RECORD so that any proceedings we take here shall be by unanimous consent.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the fact that the committees of the Senate were continued by resolution, as usual, and those committees can only exist under the rules. The question whether the rules continue or not is a rather large one, which I have no desire to discuss at this time. I call attention to the action at the last session of Congress.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, it seems to me, as this matter will probably be considerably discussed, it would be better to just let the protest of the Senator from Oklahoma be pending until ample opportunity is given for as full a discussion of it as may be reasonably desired.

Mr. OWEN. I ask that that be considered as a pending matter, so that the Senate is not at present bound until further action.

Mr. FLETCHER. I suggest that it would be well to call the roll.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Has the reading of the Journal been dispensed with by unanimous consent?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair so understood. He heard no objection.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution which I sent to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia rises to a parliamentary inquiry. He will state it.

Mr. HARDWICK. I inquire of the Chair what is the pending parliamentary status, whether there is anything before the Senate for action?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a request on the part of the Senator from Virginia for the present consideration of a resolution, which will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the resolution.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Do I understand that unanimous consent has been asked for the present consideration of the resolution?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the request of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I reserve the right to object, if I desire to do so, until after I know what is in the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 2), as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of three Senators be appointed to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of the Senate is assembled, and that the Senate is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have no objection, Mr. President.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Do the officers of the Senate, the Sergeant at Arms and the officers, hold now by virtue of their election during a preceding session of the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was trying to ascertain whether the Senator from Oklahoma wanted the ruling of the Chair upon the question as to whether the Senate as a continuing body has rules and whether it has officers. The Senator from Oklahoma simply desired to place on the RECORD a protest.

Mr. OWEN. A caveat.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; he served notice that there is a patent applied for. The Chair is not inclined to answer parliamentary inquires for the reason that everyone knows or should know what is coming up. If it is taken up now the Chair will formally rule on the question and an appeal can be taken. There is no way the Chair could rule on a parliamentary inquiry without immediately precipitating a debate on this question.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator from Montana pardon a suggestion?

Mr. WALSH. I really would like to present to the Presiding Officer that question in connection with this matter, not involving the question of the continuity of the rules at all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair believes that the various officials of the Senate hold until their successors have been by the Senate appointed.

Mr. WALSH. I was of the impression that it had been definitely determined by the Senate. That is the rule in respect to the President pro tempore, who holds his office by virtue of the Constitution. I am not so certain that there is a statute to the effect that when once elected he holds until his successor is elected and qualified. I am not certain whether that question has been determined so far as the other officers of the Senate are concerned.

I merely desire to say, Mr. President, that if the terms of those officers expired with the last Congress and they do not continue beyond the life of the last Congress, then the resolution offered by the Senator from Virginia would scarcely be in order until the organization of the Senate is completed by the election of a Secretary and a Sergeant at Arms. Accordingly, for the purpose of determining whether the resolution offered by the Senator from Virginia is in order at this time, it occurs to me that we must first determine whether we have a Secretary.

Mr. JAMES. I desire to say that the Senator from Virginia asked unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution and that would make it in order, even though the point of order made by the Senator from Montana should be well taken upon a full consideration of the question.

Mr. WALSH. I was not unmindful of the suggestion now made by the Senator from Kentucky, but the resolution recites that there is a quorum of the Senate present and ready to receive any communication that the President of the United States may care to make. Of course, if he makes any communication to the Senate we ought to have a Secretary to report the communication that he makes. We ought to have a Sergeant at Arms to preserve order before——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LODGE. It has not yet been determined that there is a quorum present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll and Mr. ASHURST answered "present."

Mr. HARDING. May I make a parliamentary inquiry at this stage?

Mr. JAMES. The regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Nothing can be done in the way of a parliamentary inquiry until we determine whether a quorum is present.

Mr. HARDING. I want to raise this point, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has ruled. The Secretary will proceed with the roll call.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the calling of the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Myers	Smith, Ga.
Beckham	Hollis	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Borah	Hughes	New	Smith, Mich.
Brady	Husting	Newlands	Smith, S. C.
Brandegee	James	Norris	Smoot
Broussard	Johnson, S. Dak.	Overman	Stone
Calder	Jones, N. Mex.	Owen	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Page	Swanson
Colt	Kellogg	Penrose	Thomas
Culberson	Kendrick	Phelan	Thompson
Cummins	Kenyon	Pittman	Tillman
Curtis	King	Poindexter	Trammell
Dillingham	Kirby	Pomerene	Underwood
Fernald	Knox	Ransdell	Vardaman
Fletcher	La Follette	Reed	Wadsworth
France	Lane	Robinson	Walsh
Frelinghuysen	Lewis	Saulsbury	Warren
Gerry	Lodge	Shafroth	Watson
Gronna	McCumber	Sheppard	Weeks
Hale	McKellar	Sherman	Williams
Harding	McLean	Shields	Wolcott
Hardwick	Martin	Simmons

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. My colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] is unavoidably detained from the Senate this morning on account of illness in his family.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I have no desire to annoy the Presiding Officer, but I should like to ask how we establish the validity of the roll call until the Chair has ruled concerning the continuing services of the officers of the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. They are at least de facto officers of the Senate, whether they be de jure or not.

Mr. HARDING. That is very manifest.

The VICE PRESIDENT. And the action of de facto officers is always valid anywhere at any time.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Chair remarked a few moments ago that the purpose of these queries and of the protest or notice by the Senator from Oklahoma is very obvious, and that is true. The purpose on the part of some of us—not from a partisan standpoint at all, but in the interest of transacting the public business—is to amend the rules of the Senate, if we can. It has been demonstrated many times that, whatever else we may be able to do, we can not vote upon a pending measure in the absence of unanimous consent. Some of us think that now we should stay here until December, if necessary, in order that the country may learn whether, in addition to that inability, we are too imbecile to amend our own rules.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. OWEN. There is no regular order.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] has asked unanimous consent for the passage of a resolution.

Mr. OWEN. The regular order is under general parliamentary law, and in that sense only could there be unanimous consent to there being any regular order.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What is the business before the Senate, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which has been read. Nobody seems to have objected to it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is there objection?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no objection of which the Chair has heard.

Mr. WALSH. I do not desire to embarrass the proceedings at all, but I suggest that probably we can go on and allow a record of the proceedings to be made by some de facto officer or by anybody whom the Chair should designate to take down what transpires. I see no reason why this course should not be taken, even though we have not officers; but it is quite obvious that we must soon determine that question.

Mr. REED. Do I understand that the resolution proposed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] has been adopted by unanimous consent?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not yet.

Mr. REED. I hope that no one in the Senate will object to the consideration of the motion for the appointment of a committee to wait on the President. Whatever else we ought to do hereafter, we certainly ought not to neglect to do this necessary thing. No right will be lost by it. We are not in a court where we shall waive our right by laches.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut will state it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Debate is not in order on a request for unanimous consent. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, there is no regular order in the Senate, because the Senate has not adopted any rules for its procedure.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should like a ruling of the Chair. I take the statement of the Senator from Oklahoma at its face value, but I prefer a ruling of the Chair.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator from Oklahoma will in this parliamentary body express his opinion without regard to the permission of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I demand the regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. OWEN. There is no regular order, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Just a moment. We are getting nowhere, and we are doing absolutely no good. The Senator from Oklahoma refuses to make a point of order, and nobody else makes one.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I make the point of order that debate is not in order on this request for unanimous consent, and I will ask for a ruling of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Unanimous consent has been granted for the consideration of the resolution, but whether the resolution shall be passed is debatable, the Chair thinks.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is the resolution before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution is before the Senate and has been read.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well.

Mr. OWEN. Now, Mr. President, I think it is perfectly obvious that the continuation of the services of the stenographers and all the officers of the Senate is granted by unanimous consent, because there is no single Senator who desires to make any objection to that, and that certainly may be considered as of unanimous consent, whether we are under the general parliamentary law or whether we are under the law of a continuing body. Therefore that much is eliminated, and the only thing that I wish to preserve is that we shall not be put in the attitude of proceeding under the rules of any preceding Congress. To that I will not consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. REED and Mr. VARDAMAN addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I presume it will take something like an hour for the committee appointed to wait on the President to report, and I move, therefore, that immediately upon the appointment of the committee the Senate shall stand in recess until the hour of half past 1 o'clock p. m.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I wish to rise to a question of personal privilege, if the Senator from Missouri will be kind enough to withhold his motion.

Mr. REED. Certainly; but my motion would not interfere with the Senator from Mississippi, because my motion was that the Senate take a recess after the committee has been appointed. However, I will withhold the motion.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator will pause a moment, the Chair appoints as the committee to wait on the President the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

ARMED MERCHANT SHIPS.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, it is not my habit to explain. I prefer that my acts and words interpret themselves, but I can not remain silent under misrepresentation, however great or insignificant my accuser may be, especially when silence would be taken as a confession of guilt. I notice in the columns of the Washington Post of its issue of March 5, 1917, that my name appears among the "little group of willful men" who are charged with the flagitious crime of preventing the President's program from being carried out by the Senate. And in these unusual abnormal days when the atmosphere is surcharged with apprehension and timid hearts yield in silent adoration to power, the offense with which I am charged is rather serious. I am at a loss to understand just why the distinction of being one of the "willful men" should be given me, because I am not conscious of having done anything to merit it. If the patient, steady clock that hangs on the wall above the head of the honorable and dignified gentleman who presides over this body were possessed of the senatorial tongue, and were not afraid of being charged with treason, I am quite sure it would acquit me of having contributed in any way to the defeat of the aforesaid presidential program. I think by the watch I consumed just 16 minutes of the precious senatorial time in the discussion of the President's program. Now, I am not in the least displeased with the character of men with whom my name is associated in that "little group," who have been made a target of the President's animadversion—and I should not be altogether candid if I withheld from the Senate the fact that I am not in the least disappointed that Senate bill No. 8322 was defeated. I was not for that measure then, I am not for it to-day—I will not be for it to-morrow—but, as I stated a few days ago in a short address to the Senate, if this bill should have been amended by the adoption of the House measure in its stead and incorporated in the House bill the amendment offered by the able and patriotic Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], I should not have in the circumstances voted against it. But I would not have voted for it. I would have consented negatively to the passage of the bill out of deference to the wisdom of the majority of my colleagues in this Chamber. But I will not delegate to the President of the United States or anyone else the power to execute a trust committed by the people under the Constitution to the Congress. Especially when I believe the delegation of such a trust to the President, as in this instance, would in all probability bring on war. I have no constitutional right to delegate such a power to the President, and from my viewpoint to do so would be little short of a betrayal of a trust on my part. I think I know my duty to my constituents, and I am going to perform that duty regardless of what any individual man may say or others do. I shall rely upon the fire of patriotism burning within my own heart to light the pathway of duty in this hour of peril.

Mr. President, I am very sorry that the President of the United States is displeased with the conduct of the Congress. I myself am not altogether happy and pleased with the work that has been done by the Congress; but since I have not a corner on all the wisdom and patriotism, and do not arrogate to myself the divine attributes of inerrancy, my sense of justice will not permit me to indulge in the luxury of denouncing those who differ from me. The Congress is a coordinate branch of this Government. Its power is plenary in the matter of regulating its own acts and prescribing rules of conduct. It has rights and prerogatives of the highest order and it would be unfortunate if it should yield those rights to a coordinate branch of the Government. The Congress should guard with a jealous eye any effort to abridge or trench upon those prerogatives. Personally, I do not take orders in the performance of my official duties from any man or set of men outside of the State of Mississippi, to whose people I am indebted for the commission I hold in this body. If I know my own heart, I have no purpose, ambition, or desire in the performance of the functions of my office here other than to promote the public good. Recognizing my own limitations, I make it a rule to consider well the opinion of others, for I have faith in the wisdom of numbers. By the attrition of ideas and friction of suggestions, the eternal truth will be evolved. I think the safest guide to the statesman is the wisdom extracted from the experiences of all the people, and applied in legislation for their benefit. I am in favor of free and ample discussion of all public questions in the Senate, and after that I am also in favor of an honest vote—a vote that registers the patriotic, intelligent senatorial will. I have never engaged in a filibuster since I became a Member of this body, and during the consideration of this particular measure, which I, with others, are charged with smothering, and for which we have brought upon the devoted heads of Senators the savage and indelicate criticism by the President, I want to say that I did nothing by word of mouth, thought, counsel, or suggestion to delay or prevent a vote upon that measure. While I was opposed to it for the reason I believed that no good would come to the American people by its adoption, I was fearful that war would be brought on with Germany, human lives sacrificed, hearts broken, billions of dollars expended, and in addition to the sorrows that would cloud the homes, the burden of taxation that would be placed upon posterity staggers the imagination. And whatever may be the motives of the President, I am willing to concede to him the highest altruism and most exalted patriotism, but that will not change the consequences. The motives behind the deed will not mitigate the sufferings of war.

The beneficiaries of war and the ones who are responsible for this agitation are the rich few in the congested centers who have made their billions of dollars out of the unfortunate conditions in Europe, and their desire is to make billions more. Notwithstanding the possibilities of the dangers that might grow out of the passage of this measure, I have remained in the Senate continuously since it met in January, and during the latter days immediately preceding final adjournment I was in the Chamber night and day, assisting in every way possible, as Senators on this side of the Chamber will testify, in the maintenance of a quorum and the promotion of the business of the Senate. I did not sign the so-called "round robin" for two reasons: First, because I was opposed to the Senate bill; and, second, I doubted the propriety of such a measure. I regard it as somewhat demagogic in nature, and not in keeping with the dignity of the Senate. Now, I want to say in conclusion, Mr. President, that no act of mine, either of commission or omission, was responsible in the failure of getting a vote on the President's program before Congress adjourned. I make this statement in the interest of truth, and any intimation to the contrary does the person or newspaper that utters it an injustice, for the reason that it has not an element of veracity in it. I want to say further, just in this connection, that I have heretofore repeatedly expressed myself since I became a Member of this body, and long before I became a Member, as being in favor of moderate cloture. I am still in favor of cloture, and I shall cooperate with my brethren in the Senate generally, and my Democratic colleagues especially, in any effort that may be necessary to bring about a change in the rule so that the will of the Senate may be expressed. I have never opposed cloture—I have never favored a filibuster; but, on the contrary, I have universally been in favor of majority rule in Congress of the United States. And I will be permitted to add that I am also in favor of the Congress ruling itself.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I did not intend to discuss this subject, but my colleague [Mr. VARDAMAN] has made certain statements which I think it well to correct. He says that he is "sorry the President is dissatisfied with Congress." If the President is dissatisfied with Congress, the President has never said so. The President, on the contrary, said he was very highly satisfied with the action of the House of Representatives, which is one branch of Congress, and that he was very highly satisfied with the demonstration of the purpose of seventy-odd Senators, constituting seven-eighths of the other branch of Congress. He merely expressed dissatisfaction with the conduct of 11 or 12 men who refused to permit the Senate of the United States to vote. So much for that.

Now, Mr. President, my colleague says that "Congress has some rights." I think so, too; and I think that one of the rights of Congress is to legislate and that, in order that Congress may exercise that right, Congress has a right to vote.

Filibustering is an excusable thing upon little matters, little partisan affairs; but filibustering when the honor and the safety of the Nation are at stake—filibustering, the result of which is to render the Government of the United States "helpless and contemptible" before the world, as the President says—and I indorse his language—is not excusable.

My colleague has said he "occupied the floor only 16 minutes." That is true. It is also true that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] did not occupy any minutes at all; but, all the same, the Senators who had made up their minds to defeat that bill defeated it between them; and they defeated it by not permitting the Senate of the United States to express its legislative opinion in a lawmaking way.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, my colleague does not in any way charge me with complicity with anybody to defeat that bill, does he?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know what complicity the Senator had with anybody or anything, and I therefore made no charge of any sort.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I will say that I hope that neither he nor anybody else will make that charge, because it is absolutely without any foundation in fact; on the contrary, I desired a vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I know nothing about that. What the Senator's intention was as a Senator is a matter in foro conscientiæ with the Senator. It is within the inner arcanum of his own mind. Nobody but God can judge the intentions of men except by the outward appearance of things. What the real intent in the heart of any man is nobody but God and that man himself know. I therefore make no charge as to the intent of any of these gentlemen, but I do say that between them they did defeat this legislation by not permitting this, the greatest deliberative and the smallest legislative body in the world, to express its will legislatively; I do say that the President expressed no dissatisfaction with the Congress of the United States. He expressed dissatisfaction solely with the conduct of those men who prevented the Congress from being a legislative body—a law-making body—doing its own avowed and undenied will; and I do say that the President was exactly right when he said that the result of that conduct was to make the Government of the United States appear before all the world "helpless and contemptible." I say, moreover, that the President was right when he said that no explanation can be made abroad, because "the explanation is incredible." It is absolutely incredible to anybody in the world anywhere, except to a few people in the United States, that there could be a condition of things in a legislative body where not a rule but the lack of a rule enables a minority of 11 or 12 or 5 or 6 men to decree cloture against a majority, to decree negative cloture, when the majority can not have cloture affirmatively. The President is not "dissatisfied with Congress," but I do not want this occasion or any other to pass which may leave the impression upon the minds of the people of this country—especially I do not wish the occasion to pass or anything to be said which shall leave the impression upon the minds of the people in foreign countries—that the Congress of the United States is not unitedly behind the President of the United States in regard to legislation which he asks. Seven-eighths of this body wanted the legislation; seven-eighths of this body took the unprecedented step of affixing their names to a paper to say so, thereby substantially saying to all the world, "We are cabined, cribbed, confined, manacled, bound, helpless, and contemptible because we have no way in the world of expressing a legislative opinion in a law-making way, and must express it by 'round robin.'"

I should be sorry, indeed, if the President were dissatisfied with the conduct of the Congress; sorrier still if the Congress were dissatisfied with the conduct of the President. But Congress is not dissatisfied with the conduct of the President and is behind him heart and soul, and nearly unanimous, in both branches; and nearly the whole people of the United States are also behind him.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. I simply wish to state that the Senator from Mississippi is not so sure about that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Mississippi is as sure about that as any human being can be about any fact. He can not, like God, know those things to their absolute ultimate certainty, and men never do; but I am as sure of it as I am of the fact that the people of the South once wanted independence. I am as sure of it as I am of the fact that the people of the North were determined that they should not have it. I am as sure of it as I am that a majority of the people of America believe in God. I am as sure of it as I am that rain will come in the future, as it has come in the past. [Laughter in the galleries.] I am as sure of it as I am that water, let alone, will flow downstream. The papers, and the people, and the legislatures, and the mass meetings of the people all over the country are speaking in tones unmistakable to anybody who has ears to hear.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The doorkeepers have evidently not discharged their duties. The occupants of the galleries must keep quiet.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, that is all I have to say.

Mr. REED obtained the floor.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for two or three minutes?

Mr. REED. I very much wanted to have a recess until the committee could return.

Mr. KENYON. I wanted to rise to a question of personal privilege. I will occupy only a few minutes.

Mr. REED. Well, I dislike to refuse any Senator that right, but I should like to keep the floor for the purpose of making this motion, because I hope to end this discussion for the present and get a recess.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I am quite content to accept responsibility, criticism, condemnation, or commendation for anything that I may actually do.

I read in the Star of last evening, and several other papers, of "the 12 Members of the Senate who blocked the vote on the armed-neutrality bill." My name is given among them.

I want to say that the statement that I in any way was part of or aided in a filibuster or helped block any vote on the bill giving certain powers to the President is absolutely and unqualifiedly false, and the membership of this body know it. Much as I desired to discuss the bill, I did not take any time even to do that. In fact, I did not occupy one minute of the time of the Senate with relation to this bill.

The plan seems to be now to include as part of the alleged filibuster all those who did not sign the paper passed around the Senate. The paper was shown to me rather hastily. I glanced over it and noted that several Senators had signed it with the reservation that they would vote for the bill if certain amendments were adopted. I signified to the party in charge of the paper my willingness to sign, placing the same restrictions as other Senators had done.

It was suggested that a separate sheet should contain the names of those who signed with reservations as to amendments. Before this was done the paper was taken to other Senators for signature, and in the hurry and confusion the matter slipped by and I gave no further attention thereto. I am not in the habit, in any event, of signing papers stating how I will vote on any proposition, for no one can tell what the condition of the bill will be when brought to a final vote.

I did not understand that the question of signing that paper was a test of whether a man was a patriot or a traitor.

If the bill concerning which this controversy raged in its final form had contained either the Stone, Cummins, or McCumber amendment, I should have been glad to vote for it. If the House bill had been the one before us for final passage, as it seemed probable, I would have voted for it. If, however, the bill in its final form gave to the President the power to protect with our Army and Navy boats carrying munitions of war to belligerents, and to protect the alleged rights of Americans riding on the boats of belligerent nations, I should have hesitated to vote for it. If under those conditions, however, the question should have finally resolved itself into giving the President that power, with others, or giving him absolutely no power, I should have voted for the bill, trusting in his judgment not to use arms or the Army or Navy for the purposes suggested.

I refuse, and will in the future refuse, to be a party to sending our Nation to war to protect munition makers in their unholy business or piling up tremendous dividends by selling and shipping their weapons of destruction to foreign powers now engaged in war; and I shall further refuse to aid in sending this Nation to war to protect the alleged right of Americans riding on boats of belligerent powers.

If war comes, the munition makers will not do the fighting. Congress will not do it. The people of this country—the boys from the farms, the shops, the stores, the banks, the places of trade—will do all the fighting and all the dying.

I propose, Mr. President, in every way I can, to back the President at this time of national crisis. I have never knowingly put an obstacle in his pathway, and will not. He has a hard task.

I few more days' debate on the bill and it would have passed the Senate in some form. The criticism is not all on the Senate. It has not yet reached the point where legitimate debate on bills should be an indication of disloyalty to the country. I listened to most of the debate on this bill. It seemed to me legitimate discussion of a most important measure. The President did not come to Congress until the last week of the session to ask for this authority. Had he come before there would have been ample time to discuss and pass a suitable measure.

I did not rise, however, to discuss these various matters, but simply to brand as false any statement, coming I care not from where, that I was in any way a part of or had any hand in any filibuster or any effort to block a vote on the bill.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa a question. The Senator states that if this bill had come before the Senate earlier it would have been possible to have a vote. Was not the Senator in the Chamber, and did he not hear the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] say that he would not agree to a vote at any time upon that measure?

Mr. KENYON. I think the Senator will agree with me, upon calm reflection, that if the bill had had three or four more days for discussion, it would have passed. While there might not have been an agreement to vote the debate would have been exhausted.

Mr. JAMES. I can not agree to that, because under the rules of the Senate it is possible for any small number of Senators to prevent a vote; it would not matter how great the crisis.

Mr. KENYON. Well, they are compelled to occupy the time by talking.

Mr. JAMES. A foreign foe might be upon American soil, burning our cities and murdering our people, and yet a few men, under these old rules, could prevent Congress from summoning a soldier to the colors or appropriating a dollar for the defense of our homes.

Mr. KENYON. I am not disagreeing with the Senator as to the desirability of a change in the rules. I have been in favor of that ever since I have been in the Senate. It is a question of leaving reasonable debate for the Senate, and not going too far in restricting the same.

RECESS.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I now move that the Senate take a recess until the hour of 2 o'clock, in order to permit the committee to report.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 12 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until 2 o'clock p. m.

The Senate reassembled at 2 o'clock p. m. on the expiration of the recess.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. MARTIN, Mr. WALSH, and Mr. WARREN appeared and Mr. MARTIN said: Mr. President, the committee appointed for the purpose have waited upon the President and notified him that a quorum of the Senate is present and ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make. The President desires us to say that he will at an early day communicate with the Senate.

INAUGURAL ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 3), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the inaugural address of the President, delivered on March 5, 1917, be printed as a Senate document, and that 10,000 additional copies be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

ADDRESS OF THE VICE PRESIDENT.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 4), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the address of the Vice President, delivered March 5, 1917, be printed as a Senate document, and that 10,000 additional copies be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

ARMED MERCHANT SHIPS.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask leave to introduce a bill and have it referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the Committee on Foreign Relations is not organized. I ask that it go over for a day.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the bill be read for the information of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not agree with either of the Senators. Let it be read.

The SECRETARY. A bill authorizing the President of the United States to supply merchant ships, the property of citizens of the United States and bearing the registry of the United States, with defensive arms, and for other purposes.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I desire to make a point of order that there is no Congress of the United States in session and therefore that no such bill can be introduced.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That point of order the Chair will sustain.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I hoped the Chair would allow me to ask a question before the ruling was made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Now, let the Chair make a statement. The Chair persumes that he is the only good-humored person anywhere just now. This is just fencing around the situation, and a very unsatisfactory situation.

From a personal standpoint the Chair does not like these rules. He thinks they ought to be changed. He thinks there ought to be some method devised whereby the Presiding Officer may at least have the poor satisfaction of being enabled to determine whether a motion is in order or is not. But the Senate is the exclusive judge of the qualifications of its Members and of its own rules. The Chair wishes they were changed.

The Chair can not believe that after 50 years of recognition of these rules as the standing rules of the Senate on mere objection they can be swept out of existence and that 96 men who represent 48 sovereign States are here under no rules and under no authority whatever, having no officers and no way to discharge business. If those contentions be true, then there was no session of the Senate of the United States upon yesterday; the present Presiding Officer is not now the Vice President of the United States nor the Presiding Officer of this body, but a usurper, an interloper in his position. I do not believe any such thing. I think he is Vice President, and I do not believe it is in your power to put him out without charging him with some crime or misdemeanor, malfeasance or misfeasance in office.

The Chair would like to have these rules changed. The Chair does not believe that the Senate, called as it is as one of the bodies of the two bodies constituting the Congress of the United States, is a legislative body in the sense that bills may be introduced, referred to committees, reported back, and discussed in the Senate of the United States. If they can be then they can be passed, and what does it amount to? Nothing.

The Chair thinks this body is convened simply to do the things which it can do under the Constitution of the United States. It can receive and confirm executive nominations; it can receive and ratify treaties. There are certain other rights and privileges which appertain to the Senate of the United States that the Senate can exercise. The Chair does not believe that it can enter upon the general subject of legislation. The Chair would be glad to hear the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should be very glad to have pointed out to me anything in the Constitution of the United States or the rules of the Senate which prevents the Senate from considering legislative business when it is summoned apart from the House. The Constitution of the United States says the President "may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them." If he has the right to convene the House he can convene that body only for legislative business, and the fact that we have also executive business does not seem to me to deprive us of the same right. I have seen frequently at extraordinary sessions of the Senate petitions and memorials presented, bills and resolutions introduced and referred.

I admit the question is a new one, but I have been unable to find anything which debars the Senate from transacting legislative business if it is so minded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair ask the Senator a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Suppose your bill goes to the Committee on Foreign Relations, suppose it reports it favorably, suppose it be taken up, discussed, and passed by the Senate of the United States; what does it amount to?

Mr. LODGE. It will await the summoning of the House. We frequently pass bills when the House is not in session and hold them for three days.

The VICE PRESIDENT. When the Congress is not in session?

Mr. LODGE. No; not when Congress is not in session, but when the House is not in session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. Yet it is a new case. I do not know anything in the Constitution which forbids it. The right of the President to summon the House separately shows that he can summon a body which has only legislaive business. Of course as to the bill which I presented, one objection under the rules, which I conceive still to exist, prevents it from being read more than the first time, but if the rules do not exist then the Senate is operating under general parliamentary law, and there is nothing to prevent any Senator from presenting anything he chooses and having it read at the desk.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think we all understand that there is going to be an effort made to modify the rules, and that until that effort has been tested out we shall not transact much business. The Democrats are to meet in conference. I understand the Republicans intend to meet in conference, and I have heard, although I of course do not know, that the question as to the rules will probably be considered in the Republican conference. I am sure it will be considered in the Democratic conference.

I, therefore, Mr. President, move that the Senate——

Mr. WALSH. Before making that motion will the Senator indulge me for a moment?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. I feel that the question presented to the Senate by the bill tendered by the Senator from Massachusetts ought not to be considered as disposed of at the present time. It has been determined by the Senate of the United States that the Senate convened in extraordinary session, without the House acting in conjunction with it, can transact only executive business, as has been suggested by the Chair.

I have very carefully considered all the debates on that subject. In none of them, marvelous as it may seem, is any reference whatever made to that provision of the Constitution to which the Senator from Massachusetts has just called the attention of the Senate. I find it difficult to believe that that subject could have been canvassed by the able men who discussed it before this body without a reference to it. But after an exhaustive examination of the question I am obliged to say that that is the situation. Yet, for myself, I can see no possible escape from the conclusion which is announced by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. REED. I wish to say to the Senator from Montana that I had intended to make a motion to adjourn for the very purpose of leaving this question open, not for the purpose of foreclosing it.

Mr. WALSH. That is what I wanted to suggest to the Senator.

Mr. REED. Of course, if we are going to discuss it, we might be here all day. It is an important question and it ought to be fully discussed.

Mr. WALSH. I trust the Senator will permit me to make a statement of my attitude with respect to the matter. I will discuss it later on.

The Constitution gives to the President of the United States exactly the same power to convene the House in extraordinary session that it gives him to convene the Senate in extraordinary session. The language is that "he may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them."

So, Mr. President, he may convene the House in extra session without the Senate. If he can, of course, the House can only transact legislative business, because it has no power but legislative power. So if the House may be convened in extra session for the purpose of transacting legislative business, it strikes me as indisputable that the Senate can transact legislative business when so convened.

Yet, Mr. President, you are quite right in the view that the other has been accepted for many years and even has been determined by this body. But we shall have to reexamine that question, and we shall have to reexamine it at this session.

So likewise, Mr. President, you are proceeding upon the assumption that the rules should have been continued in force. That question has never been debated in this body. It has never been determined in this body. I make that statement, likewise, Mr. President, advisedly.

I trust that we shall not consider that question either as determined until I have had an opportunity to advance some consideration which forces me strongly to the conclusion at which I have arrived in that regard as I am convinced on the other question to which reference has been made.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, the question of the continuing existence of the Senate has been discussed. I have the references here. I have not had time to get them together in a form to present.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Massachusetts misunderstood me. Repeatedly you will find the declaration made that the Senate is a continuing body. The question is then presented as to what is meant by a continuing body; whether that means that the rules continue from one Congress to another Congress or not.

I assert, Mr. President, that the question as to whether the rules live from one Congress to another Congress has never been directly considered by this body, although many times incidentally it has been asserted that the Senate is a continuing body.

Mr. President, let me add, because a certain practice has been followed for many years is no reason at all, although its persuasive force may be open to question, why it is the right procedure. For instance, for 76 years— yea, for 87 years—it was regarded that the joint rules of the two Houses lived from one Congress to another, and yet when that question was directly presented to the Senate in 1876 and debated in this body the conclusion was arrived at that they did not.

So, Mr. President, I trust Senators will hold their minds in suspension on both these questions, because the question now presented by the Senator from Massachusetts is one of very grave moment, and, as I have indicated, I have been unable to escape the conclusion which I have arrived at that we can transact legislative business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Just a word. I do not want any misconceptions about this matter. One thing particularly is clear, and I think everyone will agree upon it. The Vice President of the United States as the Presiding Officer of this body has absolutely nothing to do with making the rules. It is not any of his business what they are. The question whether there are or are not rules and whether you can or can not transact business are questions for the Senate, and it makes no difference what opinion I express, the Senate will settle it, and will settle it without any regard whatever to what my views are.

Mr. REED. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 22 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 7, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 7, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, draw near to us to-day. Let us feel and know that Thou art reading the secrets of our hearts. Amid the stress of our times, amid the alarm of war and the universal unrest, may we be sure that Thou art with us. May these things bring us closer to Thee. Keep Thou our spirit life calm and true and pure. May our ability to rule our own spirits be the promise and prophecy that we will be enabled to rule the circumstances of this world. Do Thou, we pray Thee, guide us with firm resolve, with high ideal, with consecrated purpose to the accomplishment of the great purpose of God in us as a Nation. For Christ's sake. Amen.

Mr. MYERS. I present a number of memorials of the Montana Legislature, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I suggest that the Journal of the preceding day's session has not been read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to reading the Journal of the preceding session? The Chair hears none, and the Journal will be read.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

THE RULES OF THE SENATE.

Mr. WALSH. I ask unanimous consent to present the following resolution, upon which I shall not ask immediate action.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. Did the Senator ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. WALSH. I shall not ask for immediate consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. I could not hear what the Senator said.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 5), as follows:

Resolved, That until further ordered the rules of the Senate in force at the close of the Sixty-fourth Congress be adopted as the rules of the Senate, with the exception of Rule XXII thereof.

Resolved, That a committee of seven Members be appointed by the Vice President, four of whom shall be members of the majority and three members of the minority, to draft a substitute for Rule XXII.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, as I am obliged to leave the city to-night I am going to ask the indulgence of the Senate while I express briefly my views concerning the subject matter of the resolution. It presents this question:

Are the rules under which the Senate operated during the last session of Congress now effective, or is the Senate governed by the general parliamentary law until rules are adopted, and is it in order to move to fix a time when the Senate shall take a vote on a pending question or to move the previous question with a view to closing debate even on a motion to amend the rules?

Before response is made to this inquiry I desire, with the indulgence of the Senate, to submit some observations.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I ask for order.

The VICE PRESIDENT rapped with his gavel.

Mr. HARDWICK. A parliamentary inquiry, if the Senator will pardon me just a moment. I take it the Senator from Montana is addressing the Senate by unanimous consent?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair so understood it.

Mr. HARDWICK. I have no objection. I merely wanted to understand the situation.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, it is undeniable that since the present Government of the United States assumed the direction of their destiny the rules in force at the close of any session of the Senate have governed its deliberations upon reassembling without any formal action readopting them, even though the last adjournment marked the demise of a Congress. Were the rules theretofore in force adopted by the acquiescence of the Senate on reassembling, or was their vigor perpetual from Congress to Congress by virtue of the peculiar constitution of the Senate and the power vested in it by the Constitution? That the view has generally prevailed, so far as any thought has been given to the subject at all, that the rules have the quality of perpetuity, except as they may be altered or abrogated by affirmative action of the Senate, is altogether probable. It is a matter of common knowledge that the rules of the House do not survive the Congress during which they were adopted. At the first session of each new Congress that body entertains a motion that the rules of the last preceding Congress, with or without changes or exceptions, shall govern its deliberations until further ordered. Until such a resolution or some other of like import is passed the House operates under general parliamentary law, unless, as has occurred, it is assumed that the rules of the last House are in force until by acquiescence they are deemed to have been reinvigorated and in effect reenacted. The House of Representatives holds that by virtue of the provision of the Constitution that "each House may determine its rules of proceedings" the representatives of the people assemble, after a general election, untrammeled by any rules any of their predecessors may have adopted; that no House can take any proceedings in derogation of the powers of its successor; that it is powerless to bind its successor in any way touching the constitutional privilege of that body, and that the language of the Constitution—"each House"—differentiates one House from the House of a succeeding Congress, as well as from the coordinate branch of the Congress. This view of the powers of the House and the limitation of its powers, now universally acceded to, was not always dominant. Though it had been its practice since its history began formally to reenact in whole or in part the rules of the House in force at the expiration of the preceding Congress at the first session of a new Congress, the code of rules adopted in 1860 embraced the following:

> These rules shall be the rules of the present and succeeding Congresses unless otherwise ordered.

Notwithstanding it was continued nominally in force until 1890, it was repeatedly held during the intervening period to be nugatory though from time to time some feeble effort was made to justify it. On December 7, 1875, Samuel J. Randall offered a resolution providing that the rules of the Forty-third Congress, which had expired on the 4th day of March preceding, be the rules of the House then organizing. James A. Garfield raised the point of order that the rules of the last House were by their terms in force without such a resolution—to which the Speaker, Mr. Kerr, replied:

> The Chair overrules it on the ground that the Constitution clearly gives to each House the right to adopt its own rules. Whatever may have been the rules or orders of a preceding House in reference to this matter, they can not supersede the constitutional right of this House to adopt its own rules.

Any doubt that may have arisen from time to time was set at rest in the memorable controversy that attended the elevation of Thomas B. Reed to the Speakership in 1889. He held that the rules did not continue in force beyond the life of the Congress which recognized their authority, and it was while the House was operating under general parliamentary law that he counted a quorum. In his vigorous style he declared:

> The Chair has always been unable to see how it was possible for a House which had passed out of existence to bind by rules and regulations a House which was to come into existence in the future.

Mr. Carlisle, the leader of the militant opposition, in the course of debate, said:

> I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], a member of the Committee on Rules, in the statement that it has been almost universally, perhaps universally, held in this House that it was not within the power of the House to bind its successors by any rules it might adopt, and that therefore each House, when it assembled, had in it the inherent right as a legislative body to prescribe for itself its own rules; that until it did so prescribe rules for the government of its own proceedings it was governed simply by what may be called the general parliamentary law.

He had himself ruled in accordance with these views when Speaker.

With much diffidence I submit that the Senate rules are equally evanescent in character. I do so in recognition of the weight that attaches to the uniform practice of the Senate down to this time and to the opinions of many eminent Members of this and the other House, expressed in a casual way in the course of debate on other more or less remotely related questions. I am reassured, however, so far as the usage of the Senate is concerned, by the fact—and to that, Mr. President, I direct your thoughtful consideration—by the fact that for 87 years, until 1876, the joint rules were treated as continuing in character just as the Senate rules have been to this day, and yet when that view was challenged, the Senate, with some dissent, it is true, in response to the sentiments of an overwhelming number of its Members, reached the conclusion that they were not. Statutes have been enacted by Congress and enforced for years without a suggestion having been made during the course of their passage or a suspicion having been aroused in the minds of those charged with the execution of them touching their constitutionality, only to be held void when eventually attacked before the judicial branch of the Government. The Missouri Compromise will readily occur to all as an instance of how the minds even of the most acute lawyers and students of the Constitution may fail to appreciate what in time is revealed as a fatal weakness in a statute.

Touching the other consideration adverted to, namely, the views advanced from time to time by Senators whose memories are revered and whose opinions upon the powers of this body under the Constitution are justly held in the highest respect, it is to be borne in mind in connection therewith that the question now before us, the continuing character of the Senate rules, has never been debated in or presented for determination by the Senate. It is absolutely new—res nova, to use the language of the law.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will it bother the Senator if I ask him a question or two?

Mr. WALSH. Not at all.

Mr. HARDWICK. By what authority, then, did the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], the President pro tempore of the Senate, call the Senate to order on the 5th day of March, if there is no usage that the officers of the Senate hold over?

Mr. WALSH. Well, Mr. President, I shall canvass that a little later, and I am going to show to the Senate in the course of my remarks that any Senator could have performed that function.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator, then, contends that it is practically by unanimous consent, in the absence of objection?

Mr. WALSH. Pretty much so. The Senate was confronted with that situation exactly upon its first convening. The oldest Senator went to the desk and called the meeting to order, just the same as is done in a political convention.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think I can understand the Senator's view on that point. Just one more question, then. I am sorry to bother the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. I am glad to have the Senator interrupt.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator contends—I have heard his contention before, as he has made it repeatedly in this body and with force, too—that the Senate is not a continuing body as a part of the Congress of the United States; but I have not yet heard the Senator contend that the Senate, as the executive council of the Nation, is not a continuing and unending body. If that is true, all of the Senator's argument has no application to the present situation, because this session is limited by the proclamation to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WALSH. If I do not canvass those considerations in the course of my remarks I will be very glad if the Senator from Georgia will challenge the attention of the Senate particularly to them by appropriate questions when I get through.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator from Montana, then, intends to cover these questions?

Mr. WALSH. I do; but if I do not deal with them so explicitly as to elucidate my views, I shall be very thankful to the Senator if he will address another question to me.

The debates in which the idea was expressed by Senators of great learning that the Senate is a "continuous body," or that its rules once adopted remain in force until amended or abrogated by affirmative action, afford intrinsic evidence that none of them gave the subject serious reflection or canvassed the considerations which impel the mind to a contrary conclusion. The most profound lawyers warn their clients against the acceptance of any views they may express without investigation, touching any debatable question of law, usually characterizing such contemptuously as a "curbstone opinion." May I ask you to disabuse your minds of any preconceived notion, to escape from the thraldom, which deference to usage long continued naturally imposes, to consider with me how far and in what sense the Senate is a continuing body?

As used in this connection the expression is intended to signify that the Senate as a constituent part of the Congress did not cease to exist as such when the Sixty-fourth Congress expired, to reassemble as an integral part of a quite distinct entity, the Sixty-fifth Congress. It embodies the idea of perpetual and continued existence on the part of the Senate, in character essentially different from the ephemeral life of the House.

But has not the entire history of this body, save in respect to the rules by which its proceedings have been guided, if any exception at all is to be made, been at war with any such theory? On the 4th day of March last, but two days ago, when the hands of the clock signified that the hour of 12 meridian had arrived, the Senator occupying the chair at the request of the Vice President, and in accordance, without doubt, with an understanding with that officer, without any direction from it, announced that the Senate stood adjourned sine die. By the mere lapse of time the body, as an organized assembly, had become functus officio. If it is, indeed, a "continuing body," why should the arrival of any particular time terminate its power to act? A majority of its Members were, on the occasion referred to, present on the floor. The successors of not a few of those whose terms were expiring, moved by curiosity or a desire to inform themselves concerning the procedure of the body of which they were about to become Members, were in the Chamber ready to take the oath.

The procedure on the occasion referred to was in conformity with that observed on the 3d day of March, 1791, when the First Congress came to its end. The Constitution provides that—

> Neither House during the session of Congress shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days.

Congress having once convened, neither House can, except in defiance of the Constitution, quit, so long as the other insists upon continuing in session, until the 4th of March, in the odd-numbered year, arrives. Nominally a break will occur on the first Monday in December when, by another provision of the organic law, Congress is required to "assemble"; but, in fact, no interruption in the work of either Senate or House ensues in such a case. At the hour of 12 o'clock meridian on the first Monday in December, 1913, the Vice President announced the termination of the first session of the Sixty-third Congress, and forthwith declared the second session convened. The work of the Senate proceeded as it had on the day previous. The first session of the First Congress came to a close on the 29th day of September, 1789, agreeably to a joint resolution passed three days earlier. (1 Annals of Congress, 96.) But on the approach of the 4th day of March, 1791, the Congress being in session, each House notified the other that it was about to adjourn sine die, and did so adjourn without either asking or receiving any consent from the other, each recognizing its inability longer to preserve its existence as a body vested with any authority under the Constitution. (2 Annals of Congress, 826.)

So complete is the revolution on the arrival of the 4th day of March, in the odd year, that under the uniform practice of the Senate, since its career began, all bills die. Though a measure had proceeded until it had reached the final stage of its consideration by this body, even though a vote had been ordered when the fateful hour of 12 of the 4th day of March of the odd-numbered year arrives, it falls, and the tedious course through which it has passed must be traversed again when Congress reconvenes. It is of no consequence when that time arrives what views may have been voiced in the Senate as it was constituted at the preceding session—how protracted or how exhaustive may have been the debate, what statesmanship may have characterized it. The Senate as a constituent part of the new Congress utterly ignores the action taken by its predecessor and proceeds as it did upon the assembling of the First Congress. Not so in the case of an adjournment and a reassembling of Congress within the two-year period between the 4th day of March of any odd-numbered year and the same day two years later. In such a case every bill retains its status over the adjournment. The work of the session proceeds as if no interruption whatever had ensued. This practice, persisted in since the Constitution went into effect, under which each new Congress in both branches proceeds untrammeled by any action which may have been taken by its predecessor on any measures that may have come before it, plainly speaks of a prevalent and accepted theory that each Congress is an entity, possessing the same degree of independence as was enjoyed by the First when it assembled in 1789.

I am not unmindful of the fact that the procedure to which reference has been made is sanctioned by Rule XXXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate as they have been observed in past Congresses. But that rule is but an expression of the practice which had been observed long before it first came into existence in 1868. It is merely declaratory in character, like the first clause of Rule I, which directs that "in the absence of the Vice President the Senate shall choose a President pro tempore," a duty enjoined by the Constitution.

The idea of a "continuing" Senate is at war with the theory of parliamentary government the world over. It is an essential conception in such a system that at intervals representatives assemble in one or more houses, transact such business as demands their attention, and then as a legislative body pass out of existence, a new assembly coming into being in conformity with organic law, or at the call of the sovereign authority. The British Parliament is "dissolved" at the end of seven years by operation of law, unless by the royal fiat its "dissolution" is accomplished earlier.

The Century Dictionary defines "dissolve" as "to disunite, break up; destroy, as any connected system or body; put an end to; as to dissolve a government; to dissolve Parliament."

On reassembling after a dissolution the House of Lords goes through all the formalities attendant upon reorganization. Every member takes the oath. The representative peers from Scotland and Ireland are admitted. The members are, for the greater part, the same. The Lord Chancellor is ready to exercise the duties of presiding officer reposed in him by the constitution, the subordinate officers, even, are all at hand, for even in the House of Commons these functionaries hold practically for life, their tenure being indeterminate, but there is a new Parliament. The House of Lords can not be said to be a "continuing body." No one ever attempted to characterize it as such. It comes together at the call of the Crown. Writs are issued to every hereditary peer commanding his presence. At its pleasure the Crown dissolves the Parliament and dismisses the members of both houses. As a judicial body the House of Lords has permanency. As a part of the machinery of legislation it undergoes exactly the same dissolving process from time to time as does the House of Commons.

When the Senate is spoken of as a "continuing body" nothing more is meant or can be meant than that two-thirds of its Members remain in office at the expiration of each two-year period; that is, that there is not a complete change in membership as is the case in the House every second 4th of March, treating Members reelected as new Members.

Reference has been made to the fact that the session of the Senate comes to an end on the arrival of the 4th day of March of each alternate year just as does the session of the House. The Senate can not continue its existence, try as it may. It can not reassemble except at the call of the President or upon the arrival of the succeeding first Monday in December. It can neither convene nor can it adjourn beyond three days of its own volition.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, the Fortieth Congress assembled under a resolution.

Mr. WALSH. I did not understand the Senator.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Fortieth Congress was assembled in exactly the way the Senator says can not be done; that is, by resolution of the two Houses of the Thirty-ninth Congress.

Mr. WALSH. If by a resolution of the preceding Congress they assembled at a certain time it would be simply tantamount to adjournment over to that day.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not know about that.

Mr. WALSH. And if they did adjourn for more than three days they did it in defiance of the Constitution and not in accordance with it.

Mr. HARDWICK. That was after March 4.

Mr. WALSH. I can not help that.

Mr. HARDWICK. But it makes a very vital difference.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator will admit, I presume, that every Senator has the same capacity as a Member of this body and the same powers during his entire term. The status of a Member of the Senate does not change at any time during his term of six years.

Mr. WALSH. Not at all.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Whatever may be said in regard to the Senate, a Senator in an official capacity is a continuing official; the office of Senator is a continuous office. I should like to hear the Senator discuss the proposition: If the office of Senator is a continuing office and does not change in any respect during the six years of his term, how the body of which he is a Member can be said to be changed in that period of time. The two things, it seems to me, are indissoluble—membership in the body and the body itself. If the Members of the body have exactly the same nonvarying capacity and functions during the entire period of their term, which covers several Congresses, the body which gives them that capacity and authority must also continue.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, let me answer the Senator briefly. I think that is not the correct view at all. There is a vast difference between the Members of the Senate and the Senate. Although a bill should be signed at the home of each of the Members of the Senate by every Member of the Senate it would not be a law. It must be enacted while the Senate is actually assembled in its customary place for the transaction of business. I am talking about the continuity of the Senate as an organized legislative body.

Mr. POINDEXTER. May I ask one other question of the Senator? How can there be a member of a body unless there is that body in existence? How can there be membership in the Senate unless there is a Senate?

Mr. WALSH. The answer to that is that the same question may with equal propriety be directed to the House. How can there be a Member of the House of Representatives without a House of Representatives?

Mr. POINDEXTER. There can not be, Mr. President. The House of Representatives is a continuing body during the term of office of its Members, and is not a continuing body when their term of office expires, but the difference between the House and the Senate is that there are always Members of the Senate covering the entire period of time, without ending or beginning.

Mr. WALSH. The plain answer to that is that the very moment the term of office of the sitting Members of the House of Representatives expires, that moment the term of office of their successors begins, and there never is any interval.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, it seems to me, if the Senator will permit me to make a suggestion at this time, that the instance which was cited by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] is one which proves too much. If it be true that the Congress has the power, by resolution, to assemble itself without a call from the President, and that fact is of importance here, would it not also establish a continuing element in the House of Representatives as well as in the Senate?

Mr. WALSH. Unquestionably.

Mr. THOMAS. It seems to me that it proves too much if it is at all applicable to the discussion.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me, I was not suggesting my entire approval of that proceeding, but the fact is that it has been done in the history of this Government just in that way.

Mr. THOMAS. I am not questioning the accuracy of the Senator's statement. I am merely saying that it proves too much if it is applicable, because it would convert the House, as well, as the Senate, into a continuing body.

Mr. WALSH. It may occur to some that this paralysis which biennially overcomes the Senate is due to the fact that it can not function in the absence of an organized House of Representatives. The Senate has on various occasions adjourned from day to day until the House solved some troubles attendant on the selection of a Speaker, the notion prevailing, to some extent, that it could not proceed with the work of legislation until the other branch of Congress was duly organized, though courtesy alone might have prompted that course.

In the debate on the choice of a Public Printer at the first session of the Twenty-sixth Congress, in the year 1841, to which reference will be made more fully hereafter, and in the course of which the remark was frequently made that the Senate is a "continuing body," while the House is not, it was advanced, and with what appears to have been general acquiescence, that when the Senate alone is called in extra session it can exercise no legislative powers. The question has been discussed here on more than one occasion since. But the Constitution itself settles the question, for it provides, as was stated by the Senator from Massachusetts yesterday, that the President "may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them." He may, accordingly, convene the House of Representatives, which has no powers except those which are legislative in character. It certainly may act in a legislative capacity should it alone be called in extra session, and if it may, how can it be maintained that the Senate can not?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. I beg to address myself to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], and ask them this question: In their judgment, even though the President did not summon the Senate or the House, and even though there were not a constitutional provision providing a date for assembly, is it not the opinion of both the learned Senators that the representatives of the people could come in, take possession of their Chamber, organize, and proceed with the business of legislation in response to the commission of the people, without regard to the fact that they were not called?

Mr. WALSH. I will say to the Senator from Illinois that if they all assembled and proceeded to the enactment of legislation which received the approval of the President of the United States, I am not prepared to say that they could not. Indeed, I apprehend that the action of the President would be regarded as tantamount to a proclamation assembling them. But, Mr. President, I have no doubt at all that if they did assemble under those circumstances, the President of the United States would be entirely justified in refusing to recognize them as authorized to transact any business.

Mr. LEWIS. Then may I ask my able friend to give me his view upon this question: Upon that theory, would we not be forced to the conclusion that until the President called them together they would have no right to come, and if we had a President who had purposes of his own in not calling the Congress, the people then would never have a Congress assemble to express their will?

Mr. WALSH. Not at all, Mr. President. The wise framers of the Constitution carefully guarded against that, because they provided that they should assemble at least once a year, on the first Monday in the month of December, unless the date of assembling should otherwise be fixed by law.

Mr. LEWIS. I thought I understood the able Senator from Montana to contend—and for that reason I rose—I must have misunderstood him—that this body ended unless called together by the President.

Mr. WALSH. Except on the first Monday in December. I so stated.

Mr. THOMAS, Mr. HARDWICK, and Mr. NORRIS addressed the Chair.

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. May I inquire of the Senator, for whose opinion I have the very highest esteem, whether he is strictly correct in his conclusion that if the House of Representatives should be assembled in special session it could legislate, in view of the constitutional provision which confers upon Congress—not upon the House, not upon the Senate, but upon Congress—the power of legislating? How is it conceivable that one-half of Congress, however assembled, can legislate? It would certainly seem to me to be exceeding its constitutional authority. For that reason I made the point of order yesterday against the bill offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. WALSH. And quite properly so, Mr. President.

Mr. THOMAS. If the House is in session, one-half of Congress is in session; and the same is true of the Senate.

Mr. WALSH. That is the argument that always has been advanced in favor of the contention that the Senate, convened in extra session, can exercise no legislative functions at all, because the legislative power is vested in Congress; but that provision must be considered in connection with the other, authorizing the President to convene the House of Representatives alone. Now, of course, the other House—the Senate—must give its concurrence either before or after the House of Representatives is assembled in extra session. There is not any question about that.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the Senator is logical; but it does seem to me that the exact and literal conferring of power by the Constitution upon the Congress is not of a character that would justify the attempt to legislate by one half of that body when the other half is not in session.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I do not think that is a difficulty at all, because it is the Congress. When a bill receives the assent of the House of Representatives and receives the assent of the Senate, it has the assent of the Congress; and it does not by any means follow—at least, that is my view—that that must be actually in session concurrently.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. I now yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. In connection with the Senator's statement that the Constitution provides that the President can call either House in extra session, and that the House of Representatives has no function except a legislative one, and therefore that the Senate can legislate, I should like to call the attention of the Senator to the constitutional provision and ask his opinion as to whether that might have an important bearing on this particular question, which provides that the House of Representatives shall have the sole right to originate legislation providing for the raising of revenue. Now, it occurred to me that possibly our forefathers had that in mind when they put in the provision that the President could call the House in special session as well as the Senate—that the House might be called for the purpose of originating and passing, or at least getting ready for passage, laws relating to the raising of revenue; but if that was the only thing that was going to be done in the special session, if the Senate were called at the same time, they could do nothing but wait until the House finished.

Mr. WALSH. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that it had occurred to me that it is not at all improbable that they thought it would be in the interest of dispatch of the public business to assemble the House, when revenue legislation was necessary, a month or two months or three months before the general assembling of Congress.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. I wanted to suggest to the Senator a rather more important consideration than that, I think. The power to originate impeachment—a matter totally disconnected with legislation—resides in the House of Representatives. That is one character of business that the House may transact, with which the Senate, in the beginning at least, has nothing whatever to do.

Mr. WALSH. That consideration had also addressed itself to me; but I reached the conclusion that impeachment, like the passage of a bill, is absolutely a futile thing unless there is concurrent action by the Senate.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I do not see how the Senator could arrive at that conclusion, because the right to try out the question whether or not articles of impeachment shall be preferred must exist; and if the House decides negatively, the Senate has nothing whatever to do with it.

Mr. WALSH. Why, certainly. I assume that they are going to find the articles, however.

Mr. HARDWICK. But very often they do not.

Mr. WALSH. Very often they reject a bill, too.

Mr. HARDWICK. I understand; but the power to consider the question is absolutely disconnected with any function of the Senate.

Mr. WALSH. I do not quite agree with that; but even if that were true I could scarcely believe that one could construe the provision granting power to the President to convene the House in extra session as being limited in its scope to the preferment of impeachment charges against an officer. I scarcely believe that that could have been in the minds of the framers of the Constitution.

Mr. HARDWICK. That might be, if the Senator will pardon me, one of the most important things that could ever be brought to the attention of the House.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, it seems to me that you might just as well claim that a grand jury could not find an indictment unless there was at the same time a petit jury impaneled to try the case, to try the indictment.

Mr. WALSH. I do not think so. I do not think the analogy is perfect at all.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think it may not be perfect, but still there is an analogy. The function of the House in finding an impeachment and the function of the Senate in trying it are analogous in some respects to the indictment by a grand jury and the trial of the indictment by a petit jury; and it seems to me that one can sit separate from the other in each case.

Mr. WALSH. This discussion has been in the nature of a diversion, Mr. President. I proceed.

The Senate was accordingly shorn of none of its legislative powers by reason of the fact that the House organization fell with the arrival of March 4 if the Senate is and remained a "continuing body." But even if it were thus limited in its powers, why should it not remain in session and proceed with the executive business before it? Two treaties were pending at the time the Sixty-fourth Congress came to an end, one at least imperatively demanding the attention of the Senate. So imperative were its claims that in the estimation of many the good faith of our Government toward a sister Nation was compromised by further delay. Senators may differ as to the action that should be taken upon it; none can question the propriety of a speedy reply as to whether it is approved or not.

Owing to conditions on which it is not necessary to dwell, 1,134 nominations theretofore sent to the Senate by the President, many of them for offices of the highest importance, in view of the grave crisis confronting the country, were before it for consideration. Of these more than 1,100 had been reported upon by the committees to which they were referred and were on the calendar of the Senate awaiting its final action.

The President obviously did not think the Senate a "continuous" or "continuing" body, in any sense in which the House is not likewise "continuing" or "continuous" in character. It is quite apparent that he did not believe that the Senate might quite properly at noon on March 4 admit the new members who should present themselves with no more interruption of the business of the Senate than attends the admission of a new member elected or appointed in the midst of a session to fill a vacancy occasioned by death or resignation, and thereupon proceed with the executive business before it or with such as he might transmit. Anticipating that the session would terminate and that the Senate would become powerless to act at noon on March 4, he issued his proclamation on the 23d day of February last, requiring this body to reconvene in extra session on March 5. This he did in accordance with the understanding and the practice that has prevailed even from the days of the fathers. The Senate realized its impotency when the fateful hour arrived and dissolved without a protest, upon the affirmation by the occupant of the Chair, a profound lawyer, that "under the Constitution" the body stood adjourned sine die.

When it reassembled next day the acting President pro tempore, who called the assembly to order, caused the proclamation of the President to be read in evidence of its authority to be and to act. No Senator, however emphatically he may to-day assert that the Senate is a "continuing" body, had sufficient confidence in the opinion he now expresses to suggest, on Sunday last, that the Senate remain in session after noon of that day to dispatch any business that might be before it, either executive or legislative.

Though the Vice President yesterday expressed somewhat hurriedly, though probably not without reflection, not only that the Senate is a "continuous" body but that the rules perpetuate themselves because it is such, he did not have the temerity to arrest the automatic dissolution of the session on Sunday. Some practical difficulties arising from the acceptance of the theory that the Senate is now without rules were suggested in the course of the comments by the Vice President, alluded to, among others, that he is, if that theory is sound, not the Vice President, apparently his view being that it would follow that his induction into office had not been legally accomplished. His right to preside depends to no extent on what transpired here on Monday. He was legally elected Vice President. He might qualify by taking the oath anywhere. The Senate has no power either to admit or to reject him as its Presiding Officer. The Senator who during the last session was elected President pro tempore called the Senate to order and administered the oath. Any Senator might have done either act without imperiling the validity of the proceedings. It has happened that there was neither Vice President nor President pro tempore, but that difficulty was easily solved. The majority Senator longest in service usually calls the Senate to order when it proceeds to organize. At the first session there could have been no President pro tempore to administer the oath, and even on assembling no Secretary to record the proceedings, no Sergeant at Arms to preserve order.

Here I might state a rather interesting historical fact, that the Senate on assembling for the first time was in session at least three or four days before it elected a Secretary.

The House of Representatives finds itself in that predicament as to the minor officers every two years. The embarrassments imagined by the Vice President are never appreciated by the House of Representaives, and such as they are they are met by every State legislative assembly—indeed, by both branches of every legislative assembly, on every occasion of their assembling except when they are convened in extra session.

Henry Clay insisted that the House of Representatives is as much a continuous body as is the Senate. He maintained that the same House that first convened in 1789 sat in 1841—its membership changed, changing, possibly, every two years, but remaining the same governmental agency. He likened the case to a court whose existence continues indefinitely, though the judges change from time to time. A court comprised of three judges would not cease to exist though the terms of all three expired at the same time instead of at intervals so that but one returned at a time. Their successors, should others be elected or appointed, would take the bench and the business of the court proceed without interruption. Senator Thurman took the same view. In the debate on the joint rules in 1876 he said:

> Why is it said that the Senate is a perpetual body? I know of no reason except one, and that is that only one-third of its Members go out every two years, so that there is always a sufficient number of Senators in office to constitute a quorum of the Senate. If the judges of the Supreme Court were all to die to-day, and their successors should be appointed to-morrow, it would still be the same Supreme Court, although the individuals would be changed. The Members of the House of Representatives are in a great measure different from those of the last House of Representatives, but still it is the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States. Its character does not depend on its personnel; its character does not depend on the individuality of its Members; it is the House, which, according to the true idea of the Constitution, is a perpetual House, whoever may constitute the individual Members of that House.

It has been seen that the idea of perpetuity as an inherent quality in the House, thus advanced by one of the most brilliant and by one of the most profound statesmen that has ever held membership in the Senate, has been definitely repudiated by the other branch of Congress. But the contention which they both put forth that, with respect to perpetuity or continuity, no distinction can properly be raised between the Senate and the House has never been answered.

The logical result of the acceptance of that doctrine was pointed out by Senator Morton in the debate on the joint rules. Referring to the views expressed by Senator Thurman, he remarked:

> The argument of my friend from Ohio, I submit to him, defeats itself. He says the House of Representatives is a perpetual body just like the Senate. Well, the House of Representatives has always assumed that it made its own rules. It has adopted rules at the beginning of each Congress, showing that in its judgment the rules of the former House are not binding upon it. The two Houses stand upon the same footing, and that would be the law also in the Senate; the rules of the Senate at a former session are not binding at the next session, and the Senate consequently must adopt its rules at the beginning of every session.

The Senator must have meant to convey the idea that, conceding the soundness of Thurman's position, at the first session of each new Congress the Senate would be required to adopt rules. The analogy to which Thurman had recourse is not perfect, as the House ultimately decided, because under the system in vogue at stated intervals corresponding with the times when the terms of all the Members of the House and one-third of those of the Senate expire, the authority of Congress automatically ceases, and its action must be invoked on reconvening by proceedings entirely new. It is not necessary to start anew all lawsuits that were pending at the time the judge's term expired. The work of the court is continuous, however the personnel of the bench may change. A court never undergoes any fatality either equivalent or analogous to a dissolution. In legislation it has been deemed wise to fix periods, corresponding usually with the terms of the members of the most numerous branch of the legislature, after the lapse of which its authority ceases, the assembly when it reconvenes being bound in no way in respect to its proceedings by any action taken theretofore, and specifically by no rules deriving their force from such action, even though some of the members may be hold overs. A "legislative period" as distinguished from a "session" is a common conception in parliamentary government.

In a late report of a committee of the House of Commons to inquire into procedure with a view to reforming the system in vogue in that body occurs the following:

> In continental parliament it is the common rule that at the beginning of a legislative period the chair should be occupied by the oldest member.

A table is given of the duration of standing committees in the legislatures of the leading countries in which parliamentary government prevails, in which the "legislative period" is contrasted with the "session."

The idea of a complete break in the life of legislative assemblies at stated intervals is implied in the very terminology applicable to their sittings.

This will be known as the Sixty-fifth Congress, and so designated in all the official records. I am sending to the desk a list, to which reference will be made hereafter, of official publications from which it will appear that in Iowa they refer to the "thirty-fifth general assembly," in Missouri to the "forty-seventh general assembly," in Utah to the "seventeenth legislature," and in Texas to the "thirty-third legislature." I hold in my hand an official publication of what purports to be the laws of the "Thirteenth General Assembly of Montana."

In harmony with the idea embodied in this form of expression, the custom of formally adopting rules on reassembling after a general election seems to be universal among the constituent bodies of American legislatures and is observed even by those, one-half of whose members or even two-thirds are hold overs.

In New Jersey the members of the lower house are elected annually. As to the senate, the constitution provides that:

> The senate shall be composed of one senator from each county in the State, elected by the legal voters of the counties, respectively, for three years. As soon as the senate shall meet after the first election to be held in pursuance of this constitution, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three classes. The seats of the senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the first year; of the second class at the expiration of the second year; and of the third class at the expiration of the third year, so that one class may be elected every year, and if vacancies happen, by resignation or otherwise, the persons elected to supply such vacancies shall be elected for the unexpired terms only."

Obviously the New Jersey senate is constituted on identically the same principle that is said to give continuity to the United States Senate. Yet the former regularly observes the custom referred to, adopting rules at the beginning of each regular session. It was followed in the sixty-eighth senate, 1912 (Journal, pp. 18, 19), in the sixty-ninth senate, 1913 (Journal, pp. 19, 20, 21), and in the seventieth senate, 1914 (Journal, pp. 10 to 13). The supreme court of that State has held, after the most elaborate argument and upon the fullest consideration, that notwithstanding the fact that two-thirds of the members of the Senate of New Jersey are hold overs, it is not a continuous body, but assembles annually, as does the lower house, as a body quite distinct from the senate of the preceding year. More will be said of this case hereafter.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does not that authority draw a distinction between that case and the Senate of the United States?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; I am going to refer to that. I am going to show just what the distinction is that the judges seek to draw.

The resolution customarily, as in the National House of Representatives, proposes that the rules in force at the last preceding session be adopted until otherwise ordered, evidencing the view that such rules would not be operative without affirmative action on the part of the body thus adopting them. In nearly half the States of the Union members of the upper branch of the legislature are elected for terms double the length of those of the lower house, and are so classified as that one-half of them go out of office with each general change in the more numerous branch. Usually the lieutenant governor is made ex officio presiding officer of the upper house. Yet they all, apparently, adopt rules on assembling after a general election; in none is any countenance given to the idea that the rules adopted at some remote time, under conditions that might be characterized as primitive, are efficacious to prevent the representatives, coming fresh from the people, from carrying out their will with all due speed.

The memorandum sent to the desk a few moments ago contains a list of 21 States—half of the members of whose senates, respectively, are hold overs—in all of which the custom prevails, to which reference has been made. For convenience of verification the page of the Senate Journal is given in each instance. I ask that the memorandum be printed as an appendix to my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, what has been thus far offered may be said to be more or less technical in character. I should despair of securing acceptance of the views which have been advanced, however sound they might appear to those who have followed the discussion, as a matter of strict legal right, unless the conviction is aroused that elemental justice and sound policy demand their adoption.

Why should the Senate, as it is constituted during any particular Congress, have power to impose its views concerning the procedure in this body upon the Senate of some succeeding Congress, one-third of the members of which, possibly, never heard of the rules to which they become subject? I appeal particularly to the new Members appearing upon this floor for the first time two days ago, and to you, Mr. President, and to my fellow members in their behalf.

Why should such members be bound by the so-called rule of "unlimited debate" which the Senate that assembled in the year 1808 deemed wise to adopt to regulate its deliberations? Is it consistent with the idea of representative government that they should be restrained by such a rule or by any rule to which their assent was never given and never asked? What is the theory upon which you decline to hold them bound by any action which the Senate, as constituted before they entered it, may have taken with reference to any bill? Why is it insisted that everything proceed de novo? What is the basis of reason underlying the want of power to proceed with all bills at the stage at which they had arrived at the death of one Congress upon the assembling of another? Clearly, because the people, whose representatives we are, have a right to have all measures that engage the attention of this body considered without prejudice on account of any action that may have been taken by a Senate whose course and record had made it odious, or which, for some other reason, had been regenerated so far as it was possible to make a change. It is because the new members, coming fresh from the people, ought to have the right to be heard and be accorded the opportunity to vote in the light of information gleaned at every stage of the passage of a bill or resolution.

The formalities observed are enjoined by the rules and by general parliamentary law, so that through deliberation a wiser conclusion may more certainly be assured. Moreover the elections which bring an entirely new membership to the House and new Members to the number of one-third to the Senate are quite the equivalent of those which ensue in most countries upon a dissolution of the Parliament. The sense of the people is taken concerning measures passed as well as those proposed. The result should not be without its lessons to those Senators who are to continue their service. All ought to act and be required to act in the light of the latest expression of the people. It is quite generally understood that the mere matter of the reference of a bill to one committee rather than to another occasionally signifies whether it is again to see the light of day or not. Neither the new Member nor the old Member whose views have changed to conform to the popular will ought to be required to acquiesce in the reference of a bill to an adverse committee. For like reasons the action of the Senate in the appointment of its committees goes for naught when it gets the regular infusion of new blood.

"Vacancies in the committees occasioned by the regular retirement of one-third of the Members are not filled up as they are in the event of the occurrence of such during the life of the Congress. They are constituted anew at the commencement of each Congress," to use the language of Rule XXXIII. Treaties fall that are not acted upon at the adjournment of any final session of a Congress, though they preserve their status from one interim session to another (Rule XXXVII). Can anyone assign any good reason why the Senate, as it begins the work of a new Congress, should be unrestrained by any action theretofore taken upon any bill or resolution or treaty or in the appointment of committees and yet be subject to the fiat of this assembly at some earlier day as to the method it is to pursue in dealing with bills or resolutions or treaties identical in every respect with those theretofore considered? The theory of the perpetuity of the rules subserves no good purpose and is a convenient one for the promotion of the ends of factional reactionaries.

It is well known that adroit parliamentarians in the service of corrupt masters of some of our legislative assemblies contrive speciously to have the rules so framed as to be useful in obstructing the enactment of remedial legislation and then tie the hands of later legislatures by procuring the hurried adoption, on organization, of the rules of the last assembly.

The idea I am combating is a refinement on this hoary but unhonored practice. It is fraught with a danger even more grave, illustrated by an incident in the history of the Legislature of the State of New Jersey, whose senate is constituted, as will be remembered, upon the model of the National Senate. As a result of the elections held in the fall of 1893 the political complexion of the Senate of that State changed, though contests were instituted which, if successful, would preserve the status of the preceding year. A majority of the hold overs were Democrats. These assembled in the customary meeting place and proclaimed themselves the duly organized senate. They set up the claim that the senate is a continuous body; that on assembling after the election the old members alone constituted the senate; that they alone could admit new members; that they alone were invested with the right to pass upon the credentials of the new members and to say which, if any, of two contesting for the same seat should be recognized pending the contest.

The conditions excited what appeared to be a well-grounded suspicion on the part of the Republican members of a plot to seat enough Democratic claimants to maintain the supremacy in the chamber of the party to which they adhered. The Republican hold overs organized, with their brethren newly elected, a separate assemblage which sat in the antechamber and claimed to be the only true senate. The rivalries of the two bodies became the subject of inquiry by the supreme court of that State which utterly exploded the claim of continuity, and with it the pretension of the majority hold overs that none might participate in the deliberations of the new senate, if so it may be called until admitted in due course by an assemblage of those whose terms had not expired and at such time as suited their convenience or their whim. The details will be learned from the report of the case State v. Rogers, 56 N. J. L., 480.

Will it be contended that on assembling after the 4th day of March in the odd-numbered years, two-thirds of the Members of the Senate of the preceding Congress may proclaim themselves the United States Senate, appoint from among their number a committee on credentials, charge it with the duty of examining into the credentials of all new claimants to seats in this body, and that meanwhile and pending a report from that committee it may proceed with the transaction of business? Such a procedure would not be an abuse of power but a usurpation

Members presenting themselves Monday morning were sworn upon exhibiting their credentials, and immediately acquired the right to participate in all the proceedings of the Senate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is the Senator from Montana referring to the present Senate?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it not a fact that the Senator from Montana himself during the session of the Senate of the last Congress rose in his seat and presented the credentials of his colleague [Mr. MYERS], who had been elected last November, and asked that they be received and entered upon the records of the Senate?

Mr. WALSH. I did.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And was that not done?

Mr. WALSH. It was.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Did not receiving the credentials of a Senator newly elected constitute an act of the old Senate and constitute a continuing membership?

Mr. WALSH. Not at all. The credentials were turned over to the Secretary of the Senate here in open Senate.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me, why did he not wait until the convening and organization of the Senate to which his colleague had been elected, and present the credentials to the Secretary of that body?

Mr. WALSH. I simply proceeded in accordance with the usage.

Mr. HARDWICK. Exactly.

Mr. WALSH. It does not signify anything one way or the other, so far as I can see.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Montana if he sees no advantage or convenience in the permanency and continuity of a set of rules for the Senate?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I have never discovered that any disaster has come to the Republic by reason of the adoption of that idea in the House of Representatives. As I have tried to indicate to the Senate, the matter has been debated and debated, and the practice in the House has been both ways. Finally the House has come to the conclusion that the procedure now followed is the course that ought to be adopted.

Mr. STERLING. Are not the rules apt to be better known and better understood if we have continuous rules?

Mr. WALSH. Oh, yes. The Senator from South Dakota, however, need have no apprehension about that, because, of course, the rules as a complete body would remain practically unchanged. It is exactly the same with the rules of a court.

Mr. THOMAS. And of the House.

Mr. WALSH. The rules of a court change from time to time, but the bar generally understands that in any revision, as a whole, they would be continued in force, and that changes would be made only in specific cases in which a necessity for the change had been demonstrated by experience.

Mr. STERLING. Take it in general parliamentary practice or general parliamentary law, is it not a great advantage and convenience that we recognize certain fixed rules as governing deliberative bodies?

Mr. WALSH. Undoubtedly. It is not to be assumed that the Senate, in modifying its rules, would disregard those fairly well-fixed principles.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I understand the Senator to say that no new Member of this body ought to be bound by the rules which had been enacted by a previous Senate. Then, a new Member may move to change the rules, may he not?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. STERLING. And if, in the judgment of a majority of this body, the rules should be changed, they may be changed at any time?

Mr. WALSH. A new Member may move to change the rules; but just so long as the Senator from South Dakota has physical endurance to stand on the floor the change could not be made.

Mr. STERLING. I do not know as to that. It may appeal to the wisdom and the good judgment of the Senate that the one particular rule to which the Senator from Montana refers should be changed. It is a matter that may be brought before the Senate at any time. It, after all, rests in the judgment of the Senate, to be determined by a majority vote, whether that rule should be changed, whether or not it is a hindrance to legislation, or whether it is in the interest or not in the interest of the public welfare.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Before the Senator resumes I should like to ask, if it would be agreeable to him, to have put into the RECORD the joint resolution adopted by Congress on January 22, 1867, which called a session of the new Congress to follow it on March 4, 1867.

Mr. WALSH. That would be agreeable to me, Mr. President, but I trust it will be put in at the conclusion rather than in the body of my address.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then, I now ask consent that the joint resolution to which I have referred be inserted in the RECORD at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator, because it shows that heretofore Congress has used its power to call a session of Congress, and that it is not necessary for the President to do so.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, it is true that in the New Jersey case the court accepted without inquiry the oft-repeated assertion that the United States Senate is a continuous body, but pointed to some provisions of the local constitution which it said served to differentiate it from the senate of that State. But the whole argument of the court against the pretensions of continuity in the life of the New Jersey Senate is equally applicable to its counterpart in the Federal Congress.

The claim rests, in the case of both bodies, upon the fact that two-thirds of the Members, more than a quorum, are always in office, and that a presiding officer is designated by the law.

Mr. President, because I am obliged to leave, I want to submit a few observations now upon matters that will be under consideration, assuming that the view for which I am contending is rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair interrupt the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to remain in the position he has taken—that it is not any of his business what rules the Senate adopts, and that he has no function except to carry out the will of the Senate—but take the old rules. The rule provides that no motion to suspend, modify, or amend the rules "shall be in order, except on one day's notice," and so forth. The Senator is conversant with it. Is there any inconsistency in the fact that there are now rules of the Senate which, if they are to be amended in any particular, must be amended in accordance with the rules, and the broad proposition that a set of new rules may be presented as an entirety to take the place of the existing rules?

Mr. WALSH. I should say, quite so; the two are utterly inconsistent. If the old rules are in force——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator does not get the point the Chair would like to have the Senator enlighten the Senate upon.

Mr. WALSH. I shall attend very carefully.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What have the old rules of the Senate to do with the desire of the Senate to adopt new rules at once, if they want to, if they are presented as a whole, instead of as amendments?

Mr. WALSH. If new rules, as a whole, an entire body of new rules are presented—and that is what I have done; I have presented an entire body of new rules, which are identical with the old rules, with the exception of Rule XXII—I have no doubt that some Senator will make a point of order that the motion is out of order; that my resolution contemplates an amendment of the rules; and that the rules can be amended only in accordance with their provisions. They must go——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Has any Presiding Officer ever ruled in that way?

Mr. WALSH. I understood the Chair to say yesterday that in his view——

The VICE PRESIDENT. There are rules here?

Mr. WALSH. That the old rules were in force.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. My contention is that the body is now governed by general parliamentary law and not by the old rules.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There are no old rules.

Mr. WALSH. That is to say, there are no old rules of the Senate at the present time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not desire to break off the continuity of thought of the Senator from Montana or to interfere in this matter, but the Chair perceives a very great distinction between attempting to amend the rules or a part of the rules, and the presentation of a new set of rules to be adopted by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the parliamentary situation of a certain resolution introduced by the Senator from Montana. I will ask the Senator from Montana if he requested the reference of the resolution to a committee?

Mr. WALSH. If my view is correct, there is no committee to which it can be referred; indeed I think that is the state of affairs anyway—that, under the rules, there is no committee to which it can be referred.

Mr. STERLING. Would the Senator from Montana say that it should lie over until another day?

Mr. WALSH. Why, no. According to my view, I say it can be disposed of just as resolutions in a political convention are disposed of, governed by general parliamentary law. There is no rule that requires it to lie over any time. That is the argument I have been making, that there is no rule, and the Senate now can proceed just as it directs with respect to the matter; and there is no rule except general parliamentary law governing its action.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator from Ohio will pardon me, I will say to the Senator from South Dakota that that is exactly the situation that would obtain in the House of Representatives, if, upon the assembling of that body, some Member introduced a resolution.

Mr. STERLING. I understand the Senator's position.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana must admit that political conventions, to which he makes allusion, first adopt the rules governing the House of Representatives until they adopt their own rules of procedure; but in this case the Senator from Montana is assuming a status of legislative chaos. We have nothing practically——

Mr. WALSH. Not at all. I recognize that sometimes political conventions do adopt a resolution of that kind; but more often they do not. They simply proceed, and Roberts's Rules of Order or Reed's Rules of Order are referred to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And Jefferson's Manual.

Mr. WALSH. And Jefferson's Manual is referred to; so that no resolution on the subject of rules is adopted at all.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, while I am on my feet, I want to ask the Senator from Montana another question.

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will pardon me, of course assemblages of all kinds gather in this country, farmers' meetings, teachers' institutes, and all that kind of thing, and they proceed quite successfully without the adoption of any rules.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, all bodies start out with a temporary organization, and adopt some recognized rules of procedure. I want to ask the Senator from Montana if he holds that there is anything to impede a change of the rule which he has in mind if the Senate accepts its recognized rules and proceeds in regular order to make the change?

Mr. WALSH. If I am sound in my opinion, it is simply impossible to change the rules so long as one man has the physical endurance requisite to prevent the change. I offered a resolution this morning which contemplates a change of the rules. Under the rules, if they do exist, any Senator may debate that motion without end and without limit; one may raise a point of order that debate upon the matter is out of order, and if the Chair should sustain that point, and assuming that the old rules are in force and that we are proceeding in accordance with them to secure an amendment, an appeal is taken, the appeal may be debated without end, and thus the amendment of the rules is frustrated.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Montana and I are agreed as to the object aimed at. I am quite content to say that I favor some modified form of cloture rule; but the point I want to make is, that where the sentiment of this body is favorable to a change of the rules no dilatory tactics can long obtain in opposing that change of the rules.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator has not been here as long as some of us.

Mr. HARDING. That is quite true; I admit that; but I am not ready to accept the soundness of the Senator's argument, that this is not a continuing body; and I can not accept the contention that we must first enter into a state of chaos in order to bring about the reform which the Senator seeks.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Montana stated, in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], that, in his opinion, there were no committees now. I will remind the Senator that Senator KERN introduced a resolution, which passed this body, continuing in force the committees of the Senate as they then existed. So that there are committees now in existence.

Mr. HARDING. If the Senator from Montana will not be annoyed at another interruption——

Mr. WALSH. Not at all.

Mr. HARDING. If there are no committees continued, I should like to know by what process the Committee on Rules authoritatively designates what apartments the several Senators shall occupy?

Mr. OVERMAN. I say that the committees have been continued in force by the action of this body.

Mr. HARDING. I think that very wise——

Mr. WALSH. I did not understand the statement of the Senator from Ohio as to the activities of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. HARDING. I asked if there were no committees now, by what authority could the Committee on Rules designate to the new Senators their apartments in the Senate Office Building?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator will excuse me just a moment, I will read the resolution which was adopted by the Senate on motion of Senator Kern, of Indiana. It is as follows:

Resolved, That the standing committees of the Senate as constituted at the end of this session be, and they are hereby, continued until the next session of Congress, or until their successors are duly elected.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Montana will permit me, that resolution indicates that the committees are in existence by virtue of a special act of the last Senate, and not because they continued under the rules, the existence of which is now being challenged by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I thought some Senator might rise and say that I was exceeding my authority in assigning rooms to the new Senators, and, inasmuch as the Senator from Montana said there were no committees, I desired to direct his attention to the resolution which has been adopted.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I think every one will acquiesce in the course of the Senator from North Carolina in the matter to which reference has been made. Likewise, Mr. President, the adoption of the resolution immediately suggests that it was the opinion of the Senate that the committees would die unless some action were taken continuing them.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. THOMPSON. There is another obstruction to a change in the rules. Under the old rules, as they have been interpreted by this body several times within the last few years, the Senate has decided under Rule XL that it requires a two-thirds vote, even when we get the question up to a vote, to suspend or to modify any rule of the Senate. The Senate, by its interpretation, has written that into the rules, although from the language of the rule itself it would seem that a majority should control. The rule is as follows:

RULE XL. SUSPENSION AND AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

No motion to suspend, modify, or amend any rule, or any part thereof, shall be in order, except on one day's notice in writing, specifying precisely the rule or part proposed to be suspended, modified, or amended, and the purpose thereof. Any rule may be suspended without notice by the unanimous consent of the Senate, except as otherwise provided in clause 1, Rule XII.

As will be observed, there is absolutely nothing in the rule that can possibly be construed as fairly implying the requirement of a two-thirds vote, but the Senate has unfortunately decreed otherwise.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate has not so decided. The requirement as to a two-thirds vote relates to a suspension of the rules, and not to a modification of the rules.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, if my colleague will yield to me for a moment, as I am obliged to leave the Chamber shortly, I desire to say that earlier in the day I presented a number of memorials from the Montana Legislature. I overlooked the fact that by resolution of the preceding Congress, the committees of this body had been continued. I asked that the memorials lie on the table. I now ask unanimous consent that they be referred to the appropriate committees to which they pertain.

Mr. WALSH. I shall object to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There seems to be objection.

Mr. WALSH. I think they can very well remain where they are until we actually get to work.

But let it be assumed that the argument thus far made can not be accepted, that the Senate is indeed a continuous body in the widest sense; that the rules are endowed with a vitality, upon which age makes no inroads. I trust I am not wanting in reverence for the political sages of a century ago whose wisdom in all things that appertain to government has commanded the admiration of a grateful posterity.

It may be that we are obliged generally to accept for our guidance the rules they prescribed in 1806 to govern the deliberations of the Senate; that we are required, in a double sense, to salute them as—

> The dead but sceptered sovereigns, who still rule
> Our spirits from their urns.

I venture to assert, notwithstanding, that their power to make rules was not without limitation. The Supreme Court defined that limitation in United States v. Ballin (144 U. S., 5, 6), saying in the opinion in that case:

> The Constitution empowers each House to determine its rules of proceedings. It may not by its rules ignore constitutional restraints or violate fundamental rights, and there should be a reasonable relation between the mode or method of proceeding established by the rule and the result sought to be attained.

The Senate, on the 13th day of January, 1915, recorded its judgment that under the rules then recognized, a two-thirds vote was necessary to the suspension of the rule. A majority determined that two-thirds must assent to accomplish a suspension. It is not so expressed in the rule—Rule XL. But it was believed to be implied therein. If so, it is difficult to escape the conclusion that it is equally implied that a two-thirds vote is necessary to amend the rules. Let it be assumed that the wise men, whose work these rules are, expressly so declared in what is now Rule XL. Had they the right to make such a rule? Would it have any efficacy? Would it be entitled to any respect at any time or place? If they had such right, they might, with equal power, whatever might be said as to the justice or propriety of their action, have prescribed that the rules should not be amended except with the concurrence of three-fourths of the Members or nine-tenths or 99 per cent, or that like the laws of the Medes and Persians they should remain immutable forever. Any such regulation would be void because it would transgress the vital principle of majority rule. When the Constitution says that "Each House may determine its rules of proceeding," it means that each House may, by a majority vote, a quorum being present, determine its rules.

It is elementary that unless otherwise prescribed by the Constitution the Senate can, by a majority vote, do anything it can do at all. Speaker Reed says in his manual, speaking of amendment to the rules of parliamentary bodies:

> Such modifications the assembly is always competent to make. Such changes can be made by a majority. This is true even if the rules already adopted provide that two-thirds or any larger number alone shall make changes. The assembly can not deprive itself of power to direct its method of doing business. It is like a man promising himself that he will not change his own mind.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARREN. As I understand, the gravamen of the Senator's contention is that he wishes some cloture for the ending of debate; and I judge from what he has said that he presumes that the proposal to amend a rule would cause contention which would finally result in a test of physical endurance. Now, if the Senator proposes new rules, does he propose to muzzle the Senate so that they shall not debate them? And if they are new rules, is there anything to prevent debate on every one of those rules by the Senate and by every Member of it? Does he think he would gain any time in the long run by declaring that we are in chaos and without rules, and undertaking to build up an entireiy new set of rules rather than by taking up the offensive rule and amending it?

That is the practical question. I am not entering into the elementaries of the matter.

Mr. WALSH. I want to answer the question in a perfectly practical way. I shall assume, as I said a while ago, that the rules will be in substance the same; that there will be no great change in the general body of the rules.

Mr. WARREN. I am putting it right down upon the basis of the Senator's argument that we are totally and wholly without rules; that we will start in to adopt new rules. If that is true, no matter if every rule but one is the same as the Senator presents it, yet every one of them is open to debate, if it is offered as a new matter.

Mr. WALSH. Why, undoubtedly—undoubtedly.

Mr. WARREN. Then does the Senator think, practically, that he would gain any time in that way rather than simply to recognize the old rules and seek to amend the particular one in question?

Mr. WALSH. But the Senator from Wyoming will recognize that if a resolution were presented here to amend only one rule, under the existing system every man who cares to do so may get up and talk about each rule from beginning to end; so they all are before us anyway.

Mr. WARREN. I will admit that under the rules there is practically unlimited debate, but what I am getting at is this: The Senator has evidently given this matter great attenion, and has proceeded with great ability, as he always does with all matters that challenge his attention; but I can not practically see where we are going to eliminate ourselves any sooner from the condition in which the Senators and the Senate find themselves if we adopt his theory that we are meeting here each time, every two years, without rules; because, as the Senator from Ohio has said, every body, when it meets, assumes the rules of some other body until it makes its own; and with two-thirds of the older body sitting as present Members, is it not better to assume the rules of the body wherein the two-thirds have helped to make those rules than to undertake to say we have none, or to assume the rules of some other body?

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Wyoming will note that the resolution to which I am addressing myself provides that all of the rules of the Senate during the last Congress be adopted as the rules of the present one, save and except Rule XXII.

Mr. WARREN. Then to what effect is the Senator's argument leading, that we have no rules, and that we are building up new ones?

Mr. WALSH. It is to the effect that as we have no rules we proceed under general parliamentary law which permits us to put an end to debate at some time.

Mr. WARREN. Well, we will do that, anyway.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I think I see what the Senator from Wyoming is driving at. It is within the power of this or any other body, unless the rules forbid, to fix a time when a vote can be had upon any question. It is within the power of this body now to vote to fix a time for voting upon this very proposition at 2 o'clock, so there is no practical difficulty in the way.

Mr. WALSH. That is the line of argument which I am now going to make—that a legislative body can not deprive itself of the power to fix a time when a vote shall be taken.

Mr. WARREN. I understand from the Senator, then, that he proposes to accept entire and en bloc the Senate rules, with one exception?

Mr. WALSH. Exactly; and that in the expectation that when that exception is reserved, and an appropriate rule is made, we can then proceed with reasonable dispatch to correct any defect that there may be in other features of the rules.

Mr. WARREN. I wish the Senator to understand that I do not object to some manner of procedure that may terminate what sometimes becomes intolerable; but I am not willing yet to take the ground that every two years we are at sea without rudder or compass regarding rules.

Mr. WALSH. Well, I am thankful to the Senator for the attention he has given to my presentation of the other view of the matter.

Mr. HARDING and Mr. FLETCHER addressed the Chair.

Mr. WALSH. I yield first to the Senator from Ohio, who first rose.

Mr. HARDING. I want to ask the Senator from Montana a question. I do not want him to misconstrue my motive, or to think that the proposition is founded on the fortunes of political majorities in the Senate.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator need have no fear on that score.

Mr. HARDING. The Senator spoke a moment ago of the framers of the Constitution having the purpose that the Senate should be directed by the will of the majority. I assume that the Senator will agree that it was also designed that the Senate should be a deliberative body. I want to ask him, in perfect good faith, if he believes the framers of the Constitution had in mind at any time the domination of the majority through a majority in political conference or caucus, whereby a minority of this body could determine the proceedings of the Senate?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I can not doubt that the framers of the Constitution had in mind the fact that they were framing a system under which party government would be operative, and in that view they must have recognized that party Members would confer and endeavor to agree upon a concerted line of action. I can not doubt that. Their model was the English constitution; experience had taught them that there were two parties in the Parliament, and that the two parties were composed of members who conferred together and usually agreed upon a certain line of action which they desired to pursue.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I am in perfect accord with the Senator from Montana in his statement that we are a Government through political parties. I think that it ever must be so, and I hope it will be so. I want to ask the Senator, however, if he is contending for a rule of the majority which will allow a majority in caucus to direct the majority in the Senate to come in here with a previous-question proposition which will deny the minority of the Senate the right of debate?

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Montana would not think for a moment of advocating any course the tendency of which would be to shut off legitimate debate; but I am sure the Senator from Ohio will have recognized in very recent events and in the proceedings of recent Congresses the necessity for shutting off something that is a mere pretense of debate.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, if I may reply to that, I am again in accord with the Senator from Montana; and I have the abiding faith that a conservative cloture rule can be made a rule of this body along the lines of regular procedure for the amendment of the rules, without adopting a chaotic condition here wherein a majority of the Senate can fix the rules.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I do not agree with the Senator from Ohio that any chaotic condition would ensue, but I join with him in the hope that a reasonable cloture rule may be adopted; and it is in view of the likelihood of the submission of such that I am now addressing the Senate upon the question as to whether, when it is before us, it will be possible under the rules as they exist—assuming that they continue—for a Senator to stand here and simply pretend to debate, and hold up the proceedings of the Senate until he drops in his tracks from physical exhaustion. I want to address myself to that question for a few minutes.

A majority may adopt the rules, in the first place. It is preposterous to assert that they may deny to future majorities the right to change them. A court would make itself the subject of ridicule that should attempt to adopt rules one of which should provide that they could be changed only by a vote of two-thirds of the judges. It would not be tyrannical to make such a rule; it would be futile. The court, when wiser men graced the bench, would contemptuously, by a majority, set it aside. It is scarcely less preposterous that a legislative body should by rule deny itself the right to bring debate to an end and to proceed to a vote; nay, that it should by rule provide that so long as any Member should hold the floor and pretend to debate, there should be no vote; that though such pretense should be persisted in until it became a hollow mockery, a transparent sham, a subject of open raillery and jocularity, there should be no vote; that so long as there remains one Member with physical strength to keep the floor there should be no vote.

In the course of debates in this body in which the remark has been unreflectingly made, frequently, that the Senate is a continuous body and that the rules continue in force from Congress to Congress, they have been likened to the rules of a court that remain in force whatever changes ensue in the personnel of the judges.

The inaptness of the illustration has been adverted to. But continue the comparison. Suppose a rule of court expressly authorized counsel to be heard ad libitum, what reverence would be paid to it in the face of an abuse of the right by council who undertook to talk against time? Would not any court make itself contemptible by recognizing any force in such a rule? To make the parallel more perfect, let it be assumed that the rule forbade any decision so long as any member of the bench desired to talk. Would not the court be declining to discharge the functions reposed in it by the Constitution by refusing to decide, after a reasonable time for investigation had elapsed and a reasonable opportunity had been given to every justice to make known his views and to convert his brethren to his way of thinking? To delay justice is to deny justice. The judge who heeded such a rule, after becoming satisfied that the due proceeding of the court was being arrested to await adjournment or a change in its composition, or some other fortuitous circumstance that might avert the impending judgment, would be guilty of a violation of his oath to administer justice without delay.

I assert unhesitatingly that the Senate has no power to make a rule which will prevent it from bringing debate to a close or setting a time for a vote. That there are limitations upon the exercise of the right to bring on a vote may be conceded, but to maintain that a rule has any virtue under which one man may, by his physical prowess alone, defeat a vote is to invite calamity unspeakable and expose the Senate to the well-deserved contempt of mankind.

Reflecting upon this question being discussed, I wrote two years ago as follows:

> Much has been said recently of preparedness and the subject promises to engage the earnest thought of Congress.
> The people whom, in our feeble way, we are trying here to represent are evidently resolved to take upon themselves burdens for providing and maintaining a Naval and Military Establishment greater than ever heretofore borne in time of peace, and rivaling those rendered necessary by the exigencies of the Civil War. A genuine alarm pervades the country lest some enemy may, in the very near future, attack us. Imagine the time at hand and the foe bearing down upon us. The crisis involves the very life of the Nation. The occasion brooks no delay. Action—immediate action—by Congress is imperative. Congress is empowered by the Constitution to declare war. Congress it is, that is to raise and support armies. Congress is to provide and maintain a Navy. Congress is to provide for calling forth the militia to repel invasions and to organize armies and discipline them to that end. Congress it is that must lay and collect taxes to meet the expenditures of war and that must borrow money on the credit of the United States for the vigorous prosecution of war. It is scarcely conceivable that war should be precipitated or be impending without an appeal from the President, both in his civil capacity and as Commander in Chief of the land and naval forces of the Nation, for some hurried action by Congress. Such an appeal comes to this body. It finds a ready response except from a small coterie of Senators, who spell each other on the floor until the enemy thunders at the gates of our cities, and the Republic has had its death blow. They may be honest but misguided peace-at-any-price men, who refuse to believe that war is inevitable, and continue to hope that the awful horror of armed conflict may be averted by further peaceful overtures.
> Multitudes of sagacious men believed in 1861 that the South would not fight and others that the North would never resort to arms to preserve the Union. It is not inconceivable that the obstructionists—filibusterers—may be actuated by traitorous sentiments. The Revolution had its Arnold. I trust I offend no sensibilities in referring to the fact that in 1861 ten or more Members of this body were expelled for treason. A Vice President of the United States who, for four years presided over the Senate, was indicted and tried for treason, and a Senator, charged with him for this capital offense, escaped expulsion by but one vote. The Senate had already at that early day expelled one of its Members for perfidious negotiations with the enemies of his country. We are all sworn to bear true faith and allegiance to the United States—a needless oath unless it be that some of us may, conceivably, require the aid of Heaven to keep us true.
> What say you? Can the Senate make a rule under which it may be held at bay by treachery until a foreign foe shall have prevailed over a supine nation?

I repeat, a rule of the Senate, the effect of which is or may be to deprive it of the power, under any circumstances, of bringing debate to a close, is void. Mr. President, I am not one of those who, being balked by some law, organic or otherwise, would ruthlessly, having the power, sweep it aside to attain his end. Reverence for law is the sure foundation upon which government and society alike rest. If in our conduct it is not inculcated, where shall we look to find it exhibited? I shall vote with a clear conscience that we violate no law, even assuming the old rules remain in force, so far as they are valid, in fixing a time at which debate on any subject before this body shall close.

APPENDIX A.

DISCONTINUOUSNESS OF STATE SENATES IN THE LIGHT OF THEIR ACTION ON RULES.

Rules of the previous senate were adopted temporarily, with or without amendment, by 27 State senates, namely:

Arkansas, thirty-eighth session, 1911. Journal, p. 6. (In the thirty-ninth session, 1913, "suspension of the rules" took place shortly before the adoption of the rules. Journal, pp. 7, 8.)
California, fortieth session, 1913. Journal, p. 5.
Colorado, eighteenth session, 1911. Journal, p. 19.
Delaware, regular session, 1911. Journal, p. 46.
Florida, regular session, 1913. Journal, p. 3.
Georgia, regular session, 1913. Journal, p. 10.
Iowa, thirty-fifth general assembly, 1913. Journal, p. 8.
Louisiana, third general assembly under constitution of 1898, 1908. Journal, p. 6.

Massachusetts, regular session, 1915. Journal, p. 5.
Minnesota, thirty-eighth session, 1913. Journal, p. 8.
Missouri, forty-seventh general assembly, 1913. Journal, p. 4.
Montana, thirteenth general assembly, 1913. Journal, p. 5.
New Hampshire, regular session, 1913. Journal, p. 12. (A particular inquiry respecting New Hampshire warrants the additional statement that the practice was the same in 1911 and 1909. Journals, pp. 6, 6.)
North Carolina, regular session, 1911. Journal, p. 8.
North Dakota, thirteenth general assembly, 1913. Journal, p. 31.
Ohio, eightieth general assembly, 1913. Journal, p. 9.
Oregon, twenty-seventh legislature, 1913. Journal, p. 13. (These rules had been "recommended" to the previous senate.)
Pennsylvania, regular session, 1913. Journal, p. 11.
South Dakota, fourteenth session, 1915. Journal, p. 6.
Tennessee, fifty-eighth general assembly, 1913. Journal, p. 9.
Texas, thirty-third legislature, 1913. Journal, p. 9.
Utah, tenth legislature, 1913. Journal, p. 4.
Vermont, regular session, 1912. Journal, p. 6.
Washington, thirteenth legislature, 1913. Journal, p. 6.
West Virginia, regular session, 1913. Journal, p. 160. (There had been a deadlock over the presidency of the senate.)
Wyoming, thirteenth legislature, 1913. Journal, p. 7.

In 17 senates the rules of the previous senate were adopted at or near the time of organization without being characterized as temporary:

Arizona, first special session, 1912. Journal, p. 32.
Connecticut, regular session, 1911. Journal, p. 9.
Indiana, sixty-eighth session, 1913. Journal, p. 6. (However, no action upon the resolution concerned is shown. The same is true of a similar resolution at the sixty-seventh session, except that its passage receives mention in the index. Journal, p. 7.)
Kansas, eighteenth session, 1913. Journal, p. 26.
Maryland, January session, 1914. Journal, p. 15.
Michigan, regular session, 1913. Journal, p. 11.
Mississippi, extra session, 1914. Journal, p. 5.
Nebraska, thirty-third session, 1913. Journal, p. 57.
Nevada, special session, 1912. Journal, p. 3.
New Jersey, seventy-first senate and one hundred and thirty-ninth session of the legislature, 1915. Journal, pp. 17–20.
New Mexico first State legislature, second session, 1913. Journal, p. 9.
New York, regular session, 1913. Journal, p. 15. (The regular session of 1911 provided that pending adoption of rules the order of business prescribed in rule 1 of the 1910 rules be adopted. Journal, p. 9.)

Oklahoma, extra session, fourth legislature, 1912–1913. Journal, p. 5.

Rhode Island, regular session, 1914. Journal, v. 8, No. 1, p. 2. (Proposed amendments to "the rules of the senate" had been defeated just before.)

South Carolina, regular session, 1913. Journal, p. 18.

Virginia, extra session, 1915. Journal, p. 11.

Wisconsin, fiftieth session, 1911. Journal, pp. 62–63. (Some minor business not related to organization had been transacted before. At the fifty-first session, 1913, the resolution was introduced, but its passage appears only by implication.)

In three senates rules were duly adopted, but without being characterized (at any stage), either as temporary or as taken from a previous senate:

Alabama, regular session, 1911. Journal, p. 97. (Rules were adopted on the fourth day as then reported from a standing committee appointed on the first. The resolution for the appointment of this committee was passed under "Suspension of the rules." Journal, pp. 7, 13.)

Idaho, twelfth session, 1913. Journal, p. 4.

Illinois, forty-seventh general assembly, 1911. Journal, p. 7.

One senate adopted rules which it characterized as temporary but not as taken from a previous senate:

Kentucky, regular session, 1912. Journal, p. 13. (These were Roberts's Rules of Order. At the session of 1914 the same resolution was introduced, and a week later a set of rules was adopted. Journal, pp. 17, 141.)

While the adoption of rules stands recorded in the journals of certain sessions only by implication, if at all, there is no State senate whose journals do not furnish valid evidence that such action forms part of the recognized program. In the case of every State senate, definitely recorded adoption of rules can be found without looking far.

APPENDIX B.

Chap. X. An act to fix the times for the regular meetings of Congress.

Be it enacted, etc., That in addition to the present regular times of meeting of Congress there shall be a meeting of the Fortieth Congress of the United States, and of each succeeding Congress thereafter, at 12 o'clock meridian on the 4th day of March, the day on which the term begins for which the Congress is elected, except that when the 4th of March occurs on Sunday, then the meeting shall take place at the same hour on the next succeeding day.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That no person who was a Member of the previous Congress shall receive any compensation as mileage for going to or returning from the additional session provided for by the foregoing section.

Approved, January 22, 1867.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator from Virginia yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. MARTIN. I withdraw the motion for the present.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask the Senator from Montana whether he put in the RECORD the New Jersey case?

Mr. WALSH. No; I did not.

Mr. OVERMAN. Would the Senator object to putting it in, and also the dissenting opinion?

Mr. WALSH. I will be very glad if that order will be made.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask unanimous consent to put in the RECORD a little extract from a book entitled "Harrison, This Country of Ours." President Harrison was for a long time a Member of this body. He was one of the greatest lawyers who ever sat in the Senate. I ask leave to put in the extracts that I have marked here. He says that the rules of the Senate remain in force from one Congress to another; that the Senate is always a continuing body. I have marked the places.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will not the Senator read it?

Mr. OVERMAN. I did not want to take the time to read it.

Mr. McCUMBER. It seems to me that it ought to be read.

Mr. OVERMAN. Very well; I will read it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Or let the Secretary read it. If it is to go into the RECORD we ought to know what it is.

Mr. OVERMAN (reading):

When a Senator is elected and receives his certificate of election from the governor he usually causes it to be presented to the Senate by his colleague before his own term begins. The certificate is received and filed, if regular in form; but if objection is made to the certificate, or the election is in any way challenged, the questions arising are referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for examination. The Senate is always an organized body. Its presiding officer—the Vice President—calls the Senate to order at the assembling of a new Congress and the Secretary, Sergeant at Arms, and other officers and clerks who hold office during the pleasure of the Senate resume their duties. If the Vice President is not present when the Senate assembles the Secretary of the Senate, or, in his absence, the Chief Clerk, performs the duties of the Chair, pending the election of a President pro tempore. The President pro tempore is entitled to call any Senator to the chair, but such a designation can not extend beyond an adjournment unless unanimous consent is given. If the session is a regular one the presiding officer raps for order and announces that the Senate is in session pursuant to law. If the session is a called or special one the proclamation of the President convening the Congress, or the Senate, as the case may be, is read and entered upon the Journal. The Senators-elect are escorted in groups of four (each usually by his own colleague) to the desk, and the oath of office is administered by the President of the Senate.

The rules of the Senate remain in force from one Congress to another, save as they may from time to time be modified. There is, however, a body of joint rules of the Senate and House of Representatives, and, as the concurrence of the House is necessary, these must be reenacted at the beginning of every Congress.

In the House the process of organization is quite different from that of the Senate. There are no hold-over members or officers, save that certain temporary duties are devolved by law upon the Clerk of the next preceding House. The law provides that he shall make a roll of the Representatives-elect, placing thereon the names of those persons whose credentials show that they were regularly elected. The practice is that when the hour of assembling arrives the Clerk of the preceding House calls the roll made up from the credentials filed with him, and, if a quorum is present, announces that fact, and that the first business in order is the election of a Speaker. Nominations for that office are then made, and, under the supervision of tellers, named by the Clerk from among the Members, the roll is called by him and the result announced. The oath of office is administered to the Speaker by a Member of the House, the habit being to devolve that duty upon the Member who has had the longest continuous service—the "father of the House," as he is called. The Members from each State are then called and the oath of office is administered to them by the Speaker. The adoption of a body of rules for the House has not always been an easy matter, and sometimes great delay and much excitement have attended the work. Often, by resolution, the rules of the last House are adopted to govern the proceedings until a new code is prepared and receives the concurrence of the House. If some such expedient is not adopted the House proceeds without any rules, except so far as the general rules of parliamentary law may be applicable.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. MARTIN. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. Thanking the Senator from Virginia, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Under the present status of the Senate may resolutions be introduced?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has observed that the proceedings up to this time have permitted the introduction of resolutions by unanimous consent, those resolutions going to the table.

Mr. LEWIS. I thank the Chair. I desire to present one to-morrow; not to-day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Resolutions on legislative matters are not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not so state, except that some resolutions have been presented.

Mr. THOMAS. Anything is in order by unanimous consent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It must be a matter relating to executive business.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, March 8, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 8, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, the author of our liberty, defender of our rights, we turn our hearts to Thee this morning hour for that inward illumination by which alone we can know the things that make for our eternal peace. We thank Thee that Thou hast not permitted our spark of human knowledge to hide from us the vision of Thy glory and the reality of Thy thought and care and purpose for human life. We seek in Thy light to see light and turn our hearts to Thee that our path may be illumined by the Divine purpose and wisdom. So do Thou guide us this day in the discharge of our duties. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution and ask that it be read, and when it has been read I will ask for its immediate consideration.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate shall, from and after its adoption, enforce the following rule, which is hereby adopted:

"If at any time a motion, signed by 16 Senators, to bring to a close the debate upon any pending measure is presented to the Senate, the Presiding Officer shall at once state the motion to the Senate, and one hour after the Senate meets on the following calendar day but one, he shall lay the motion before the Senate and direct that the Secretary call the roll, and upon the ascertainment that a quorum is present the Presiding Officer shall, without debate, submit to the Senate by an aye-and-nay vote the question:

"'Is it the sense of the Senate that the debate shall be brought to a close?'

"And if that question shall be decided in the affirmative by a two-thirds vote of those voting, then said measure shall be the unfinished business to the exclusion of all other business until disposed of.

"Thereafter no Senator shall be entitled to speak in all more than one hour on the pending measure, the amendments thereto, and motions affecting the same, and it shall be the duty of the Presiding Officer to keep the time of each Senator who speaks. Except by unanimous consent, no amendment shall be in order after the vote to bring the debate to a close, unless the same has been presented and read prior to that time. No dilatory motion, or dilatory amendment, or amendment not germane shall be in order. Points of order, including questions of relevancy, and appeals from the decision of the Presiding Officer, shall be decided without debate.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I think it proper I should state to the Senate that in asking for the immediate consideration of this resolution I want it known that there is no desire to cut off legitimate debate. I expect the resolution to have full and complete discussion so far as Senators may desire to discuss it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I earnestly hope there will be no objection made to the immediate consideration of the resolution.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I had hoped that this rule might be so drawn as to make it a little more drastic during the last few days of a session. My belief has been that a majority or at least a two-thirds vote of the Senate should have the right to further limit or conclude debate in the closing days of a session. I am satisfied, however, and I have talked the subject over with a number of Senators, that the rule presented by the Senator from Virginia is perhaps the best that can be obtained now. For this reason I earnestly hope that the proposed rule will be adopted, if we can get nothing better.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia asks for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, now that unanimous consent has been allowed for the consideration of the rule, may I ask the Senator from Virginia to permit me to introduce a resolution that it may lie on the table, not interfering with the debate?

Mr. MARTIN. This is the foundation of the business of this session of the Senate, and I hope matters that can be presented at any other time will not be injected to impede it. I most earnestly request that that may not be done.

Mr. BORAH. What is the request of the Senator from Virginia?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He requests unanimous consent for the consideration of what is known as the cloture rule. The Chair hears no objection, and it is before the Senate.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask that the proposed rule be adopted.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I am very heartily in favor of this resolution which proposes to amend rules of the Senate so that debate may be closed. In 1911, when certain Senators on the other side were filibustering against certain measures which were then pending, I offered an amendment to the rules providing that two-thirds of the Senators might close debate after a certain time. That proposed amendment was not reported from the committee. In May, 1916, an amendment to the rules substantially like the one now proposed was reported unanimously from the Committee on Rules. That resolution, which enabled two-thirds of the Senate to close debate was on the calendar from May, 1916, to March 4, 1917, but was not taken up. The change proposed by the resolution was agreed to by a joint committee of the majority and the minority. I therefore hope this resolution may be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the adoption of the proposed rule.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the immediate reason for the presentation of this resolution proposing to amend the rules is the failure to pass the armed merchant ship bill occurring when the Sixty-fourth Congress automatically adjourned last Sunday at noon. There was previous to the introduction of this measure a statement by the President which contains the following:

It would not cure the difficulty—

Referring to the defeat of the bill named—

It would not cure the difficulty to call the Sixty-fifth Congress in extraordinary session.

The paralysis of the Senate would remain. The purpose and the spirit of action are not lacking now.

The Congress is more definitely united in thought and purpose at this moment, I venture to say, than it has been within the memory of any man now in its membership. There is not only the most united patriotic purpose, but the objects members have in view are perfectly clear and definite.

But the Senate can not act unless its leaders can obtain unanimous consent. Its majority is powerless, helpless. In the midst of a crisis of extraordinary peril, when only definite and decided action can make the Nation safe or shield it from war itself by the aggression of others, action is impossible.

RULES SHOULD BE ALTERED.

Although, as a matter of fact, the Nation and the representatives of the Nation stand back of the Executive with unprecedented unanimity and spirit, the impression made abroad will, of course, be that it is not so, and that other governments may act as they please without fear that this Government can do anything at all. We can not explain. The explanation is incredible.

The Senate of the United States is the only legislative body in the world which can not act when its majority is ready for action.

A little group of willful men, representing no opinion but their own, have rendered the great Government of the United States helpless and contemptible.

The remedy? There is but one remedy. The only remedy is that the rules of the Senate shall be so altered that it can act. The country can be relied upon to draw the moral.

This is the placing of the responsibility for the failure of the bill in question on the Senate or on the small number of Senators who are alleged by their action to have prevented a roll call on the bill. I was for this bill, Mr. President. I would have voted for it if a roll call had been had in its extreme form as originally written. I will vote for it yet, if an extraordinary session of Congress be called, in the form in which it was originally written.

The President knows, this Senate knows, and the House knows what the general public does not know. The President intentionally seeks to convey to the country the impression that only a change of the rules in the event of a special session would make it possible for such legislation successfully to be considered at that special session. That is not practically true, however theoretically it may be sought to make it appear to be true.

There is in the memory of no person now having a seat in the Senate delayed action or a filibuster which destroyed meritorious legislation, save during the last few weeks of the short session, when Congress automatically adjourns on the succeeding 4th day of March of that year. That is known to this body. It is known to the President. It is not stated in this article or prepared statement which I have read, and which was given to the press and sown broadcast throughout the country. The entire truth ought to have been stated. The entire truth was not stated. A portion of the truth was deliberately omitted, I believe, from that statement to make a stronger case, and thereby arouse greater resentment against the few Senators who opposed the bill in this body. It is not a fair statement.

I intend to support the bill if an extra session be called. I repeat that in order that I may not be misunderstood. But I repeat also that this statement going abroad by the President was an unfair statement. It lacks the candor the people have the right to expect from their President. It intentionally, I think, suppressed the part that I will supply.

If an extraordinary session of Congress be called to-morrow, it is not within the power of any 8 Senators, or 12, to delay legislation on the bill in question beyond from 2 to 4 weeks at the utmost.

There is a limitation, where mere exhaustion applies the cure. It is always in the power of the Senate to apply the remedy by continuous sessions, except the last few days named. The conditions that prevailed when this bill began originally to be urged for the first time are not contained in this statement, Mr. President. The conditions are that the entire legislation of a contested character at this session had accumulated. It had come down on the calendar or was before the Senate, reported out of committees in such a way that the appropriation bills had consumed considerable time and were demanding more. The naval appropriation bill had taken up a great deal of time. The legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill and all the bills of a general character appropriating money and otherwise, as well as the revenue bill, came on for consideration at the last of the session.

I shall not criticize human nature; no criticism would change it; but the methods of transacting business in both branches of Congress are well known. The important legislation accumulates until the last of the session. Then a great jam of bills occurs, time is taken, the supporters of various bills and those requiring action to advance them crowd for place. At that time a filibuster can be successfully used, and at no other time save when that accumulation of business occurs at the end of a short session. That was known to but is not stated by the President.

If this resolution were defeated, if no action were had by the amendment of the rules, if the President called Congress in extraordinary session within not exceeding 30 days from the time the two branches met, a roll call would be had upon this bill without any amendment of the rules. The rules are sought to be made the scapegoat for the deficiencies of human nature, the methods of transacting business in this body and the amendment of the rules that have long been sought unsuccessfully to be amended urged as a parliamentary nostrum to usher in a legislative millenium. These conditions have been seized solely for the purpose of breaking down the rule of the Senate and riveting Executive control on the Senate as firmly as on the House.

To me it is of no personal concern, but I do object to making a few Senators the object of the President's wrath in an unfair statement that was sent out to the general public. If this bill had come in due time it would not have been possible for those Senators to have defeated it by delaying a roll call until the adjournment. No one questions that who knows the methods of transacting business here.

If this change is made it can or will be done by a majority vote of the Senate. A quorum being present, 49 or more, 25 or more will adopt it. It provides that on the application of 16 Senators they may in effect by a two-thirds vote bring any pending measure within the time named in the rule, a very short one, to a roll call. If it can be done by a two-thirds vote, and such a rule changed by a majority vote, to begin with, and another rule can be adopted, either to-day or at any time hereafter, by which the change of the rule can be made by a mere majority on the application of 16 Senators or fewer—by a mere majority, let it be remembered—and the two-thirds rule will be abolished.

I suppose the two-thirds rule has been selected, because it is thought to be entirely safe when two-thirds desire a roll call that it should be had. Concede it to be so, but the concession of the power to amend the rule by a majority, so as to require a two-thirds vote for the modification of this rule, establishes the precedent for the modification of the rule itself, so that a mere majority, instead of two-thirds, may relax this proposed rule or any other rule which it may be desired to change.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am going to invite the Senator's attention to this fact, however: While it is true that the rules might be changed by a majority, yet you never would be able to get a vote on a proposition to change the rule unless two-thirds agreed to close debate on that proposition. So it amounts to the same thing.

Mr. SHERMAN. I say, in reply to that suggestion, that the Senate can change its rules by a mere majority, and the adoption of the new rule——

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; but when the motion was presented, if the Senator please, to change the rule, the debate on that proposition could not be closed, except by the unanimous consent of two-thirds of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not necessarily. The same principle will apply. There will be a limit within which the debate can be conducted. The suspension of the rule, of course, requires two-thirds.

Mr. HARDWICK. I know, but if the Senator will pardon me, in order to make it plain, suppose a proposition was brought here, as the Senator says, to establish cloture by a majority vote, that proposition itself could never be brought to a vote unless two-thirds of the Senators present agreed to end discussion on it.

Mr. SHERMAN. But the Senator must bear in mind that when the precedent is established that two-thirds can bring a question of amending the rules to a roll call, the proposed amendment itself can be adopted by a majority vote. That is the statement, and it will be the ruling of the Senate when the final decision comes. I only request the Senator to wait and see whether this rule itself will not in turn be some time amended by a mere majority vote.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me there, I desire to remind him, however, that in the government of this body, it has never required anything but a majority vote to adopt a rule. That is nothing new.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then there is no controversy between the Senator and myself. A majority vote adopts this change of the rule. Then when the two-thirds vote is sought to be taken if a majority can change that——

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; but it will always take two-thirds to bring the debate to an end, even on a proposition to change the rules.

Mr. SHERMAN. How will the two-thirds rule be made of perpetual operation, if this resolution is agreed to?

Mr. HARDWICK. Because, unless two-thirds of the Senate consent to go to a vote on any proposition to change the rules so as to establish a majority cloture, it can not be done.

Mr. SHERMAN. The same precedent made here to-day, I say to the Senator from Georgia, will be binding as authority to again amend section 22, by striking out the two-thirds part of the amendment and making it a bare majority. To that there is no answer made.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois speaks of the precedent being established. Are we not now proceeding by unanimous consent and not by a majority vote to consider this proposition?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; there is no doubt about that. Any one Senator could have delayed the consideration of this proposed amendment.

I do not see, Mr. President, the necessity for this precipitate action. The war in Europe began in August, 1914. It will be two years ago this coming May since the Lusitania was sunk and the horrors of submarine warfare were first instituted. Since that time many other steamships of the allies have been sunk. Our own shipping has been sunk, carrying clearance papers from the neutral ports of the United States and destined to other neutral ports. Sailors, citizens of the United States, have lost their lives in that time. Another horror a few days ago, that of the Laconia, has occurred. In the two years nearly, next May, since the first steamship was sunk a great number of persons have lost their lives, a number of whom were citizens of the United States.

What has occurred during all that time? I wish to remind the President when he seeks to blame the Senate, to blame the Senate rules, and to blame a few Senators here, that during a large part of that time he has ridiculed the thought of preparedness; he has ridiculed it not only in the Army but in the Navy, and in a message delivered to the joint session of Congress he referred to the demand for the upbuilding of the Navy and dismissed it with the light suggestion that naval architecture and warfare were so changeable that if a Navy were built at the expense of millions of dollars it would be worthless in a very short time. That was in his address in Indianapolis, Ind., on Jackson Day. He said other nations had a right to spill as much blood as they pleased, and that it was no concern of ours. He called for absolute neutrality. The destruction of the Lusitania, the policy of unrestricted submarine frightfulness, created in his bosom no horror; it shocked no sensibility; it caused no proclamation, no convening of Congress in special session, or attack upon the rules of the Senate. He viewed it with indifference and dismissed it without apology or regret. Our border has remained in such a condition that within a zone of 50 miles no plantation or ranch owner has been safe. It is in that condition yet. Still, that called for no change in the rules; nothing has been done; all of that has come on apace without criticism and without demand for legislation. Murdered citizens on land along the Mexican border aroused no more concern than the Lusitania dead at sea.

I remember when petitions came to this body, not singly but by the thousands, when they were brought in here in a basket in huge rolls—individual petitions against the sale of munitions of war. The law of nations for 300 years has been that a neutral nation may open its market for war supplies to the nations of the world. From the time Hugo Grotius wrote his first book on the Laws of Peace and War, found in the library of every international lawyer in this Capitol, that has been true. It is true now. The protests came in; they have not been heeded. As a neutral we have kept our markets open to all the world, belligerents and neutrals alike. We have literally sent to the warring nations millions upon millions of dollars' worth of war supplies.

There is a factory within sight of the steps of this Capitol Building that has sent abroad to the battle fields of Europe its deadly product. So munitions have gone from Indiana. One plant in Indiana makes 48,000 pounds of guncotton every 24 hours. With three shifts at hand, it has never shut its doors since 1914. As soon as a carload is ready it is put in a car, shipped to New York, and taken across the Atlantic to fight the battles of the allies. Guncotton, explosives, and shells made in Indiana were used in the Battle of the Marne. We are a great neutral Nation; but our neutrality is a benevolent one, tinged at the same time with the profits that go with the traffic in munitions of war. I have not believed that we should change, and I shall not vote to change, the law of nations after war begins by an act of Congress so as to exclude the nations of the world, all alike, from buying war supplies in our open market.

The question has been asked in this body in my hearing, if this bill becomes a law, whether the President proposes to take guns from the navy yards and gunners from the United States Navy and put them on merchant ships, loaded with munitions of war in the future as in the past, and by the arms and the gunners of the United States on board enable the merchant ships to fight their way through the line of steel drawn by German submarines as they approach the ports of the allies, and by force of arms, supplied and used by the United States on board a merchant ship enter the belligerent ports, although we are claiming to be a great neutral Nation? That question has been asked; and it has not been answered in this body by any of the friends of the bill. It was not asked of me; but I am willing to answer it. Under this bill the President will have that right; and that right exercised, that act committed is an act of war. Without any formal declaration of Congress, we are then in a de facto war, without that mere formality that precedes the clash of arms. That is what this bill means, and it means nothing else.

As a necessary corollary to that, Mr. President, the Navy of the United States can be used to convoy merchant ships laden with war supplies across the ocean to be landed at a port of the allies, even though it be done at the end of a naval battle with German warcraft. Is that a neutral act? I am voting for this bill, understand; but I wish no man to vote for it, much less myself, under any mistaken impression that he thinks it is armed neutrality in selling war supplies to be delivered at the ports of the allies. The President can not repeat the Vera Cruz fiasco with Germany. The Kaiser is not Huerta. It will be done either with guns from our Navy or by gunners working the guns from the same Navy; and I intend to vote for it with a full understanding that, if the President exercises that power, there is a de facto war; and no discretion is left to us afterwards except to humiliate the President and the country or to declare war when this question shall have been presented to us. When I vote for this bill I am saying to you in advance I am prepared to vote for war if the President exercises either of those powers authorized in the bill, and the exigency leaves no other alternative than stated.

I know what it means. We have not been neutral. I have my sympathies in the struggle across the sea. I voted twice against my own sympathies. I do not favor the Kaiser's Government or what it represents. It is an autocracy; it is militaristic; it is the dominance of the German States by Prussia; it is the execution of the declared purposes of Bismarck in the seventies, who, when asked how he would produce a union of the German States, by what legislative processes, by what statecraft, replied, "By none; but the German Empire will be welded by blood and iron." It is even so. The German Empire was created by blood and iron, and it is Prussia's ruthless creed to-day that in all this world there is nothing finally to decide the question of right and wrong but might; that the sword is the arbiter and that the army is the sovereign wherever its measured tread is heard. Germany and her indomitable people are great not because of her Government but in spite of it.

I know what it maens. I believe in a democratic form of govenrment. I have no sympathy with the absolutism of either kaiser or czar. My sympathies are against that arbitrary authority wherever found; but that does not blind me to the fact that this war did not begin on the question of mere democracy and autocracy; it may now be such a struggle. It began out of a thousand years of jealousy and race hatred and territorial aggression, of conflicting ambitions, with crowned kings deriving their authority from their ancestors by mere accidents of birth. It came upon the world as a struggle on land and sea growing out of the commercial rivalries of 16 nations of Europe; it is that to-day.

It is said that we are doing it to protect our integrity, our independence, and our sovereignty. Again, let us not deceive ourselves. That will be the purpose of the patriot who enlists on the call of the President; it may be the purpose of some Members of this body who, when the call is made, will leave their seats and their official authority and go where the call leads. That may be the purpose, but, after all, those who agitate, who shout for war have other motives less exalted. From many of the large cities of the country comes a call for an embargo to stop the exportation of food products. My desk has been loaded with them in months past; and still, except from the peace societies and those who disbelieve in war, I have not a solitary letter or petition from a citizen of the United States protesting against the export of war supplies. The places which cry out for war the loudest are where munitions of war are exported the most.

Do not mistake the country. Do not be deluded by mere locality. I do not question the sincerity or the patriotism of those along the eastern Atlantic coast. They are patriotic, and from the great centers of population and from the rural districts there is an earnest desire to sustain the President in order that our country may not be humiliated, weakened, or dishonored. But I have given due heed to the protests that have come against the exports of food supplies, from labor unions whose members have difficulty in sustaining their families; from all the many who have protested against such exports; and not one of them has protested against the export of war supplies except the numerous specific petitions I name.

Along the eastern coast, Mr. President, there is an undoubted sentiment for war. In the middle and far West, on the prairies and in the belted woodlands of that distant region they know that the money gained in the blood-stained traffic in war supplies has lodged along the eastern coast. It has not been generally distributed. Money is as close in many parts of the West to-day as it was before the war broke out. There are in that country, Mr. President, millions of people. I have touched elbows with the men who saw the Indians come into Chicago bringing their furs to traffic with the traders at that post when old Fort Dearborn marked the outposts of western civilization. Since that time millions of people have settled in that country. You along the Atlantic coast have not considered public sentiment in that country. I know what the many-tongued press has said and what they will say. I am willing to take the risk on being misinterpreted, criticized, or misunderstood. If any editor in New York City is clamoring for armed conflict let him throw down the pen that he thinks is mightier than the sword, gird on his armor, and go forth to conquer. I am in favor of conscripting every belligerent editor that is shouting for war in his editorial columns. These are not the ones whose blood will be shed on the battle fields of Europe or this continent, Mr. President. Our soldiers are the men in Illinois who are now beginning, at the southern end of the State, to follow the plow, preparing for the seeding of the spring crops. They are in the great States of the West, the railroad men, who take their trains out every morning, on engine and in car. They are the ones who work in the shops and the mines, the men of sturdy character, of heroic mold, whose ancestors laid the foundation of empire 100 years ago. They are the ones whose red American blood will be shed in torrents because somebody wants to convoy armed ships laden with war supplies across the Atlantic, through the line of German submarines, and sell their product in a market where the allies need it; and yet I may be willing to vote for it, Mr. President. I may be willing to go that far.

Two things have decided me on that course. One is the danger zone created by an arbitrary decree at Berlin some time ago, in which the open sea was withdrawn as a way of commerce for the neutral world. The open sea has been made a theater of war involuntarily to peaceful nations, so that no ship, belligerent or neutral, can navigate it. I regard it as indefensible, as utterly without right as to neutrals in either peace or war. It is destructive of our maritime rights.

Again, the admitted effort of Zimmermann, in charge of foreign affairs for the German Imperial Government, who has undertaken to involve Japan and Mexico against us, is an indication of deliberate hostile intent. Whether it would have come to any practical end or not, we need not inquire to-day. It is sufficient that it is admitted that this was done, and I regard that alone as an act of war against us. It justifies us in the passage of such a bill; but does not justify nor require this amendment of the rules of the Senate. The President makes it the excuse for what he desired to do anyhow.

It is of no concern to me what the rules of the Senate are. If you limit speeches to five minutes, I can say within that allotted time all I care to say. I have engaged in two filibusters; and let me say to you that I am violating no confidence—an open confession is good for the soul—when I tell how it happened. At no time did I engage in a filibuster, my fellow Senators on the majority side of this Chamber, when it was not by the connivance and request of the Senators who are to-day heaping their anathemas upon other Senators who used the same right against the bill they opposed.

It makes all the difference in the world whose ox is gored. If some vile conspirators defeat a bill that you think is the climax of legislative wisdom, then a filibuster becomes wholly an evil thing. Why, even the distinguished Senator and friend of popular government from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], who is a shining light in the National Popular Government League, admits that he once engaged in this nefarious practice. It was to kill some legislation that he thought required extinction, speedy or lingering, as the case might be. He defends it by saying he did it in the interest of the people.

I doubt not that every Senator who had a part in the filibuster under criticism would say that he, too, did it for the people. What people? He did it for that unnumbered host whose souls will go up from earth's battle fields, and whose stark faces will turn with unseeing eyes to the same sky whose stars have watched for centuries the voiceless dead when the storm of conflict has swept on to new slaughter; for the thousands that will sink to the depths of the sea in the war upon the ocean; for the children made fatherless; for the eternal widow in black, for the distress sown wide, for the clay that will be heaped over new-made graves. He did it for those people, who still walk among the living. Shall not some Senators speak for them? Have they not some argument equal to that of the Senator from Oklahoma, who did it for some people in Oklahoma or Arizona?

It makes the world's difference whether you are for a bill or against it. Democrats have used this expedient, as we have. It is a weapon of the minority party. I am not opposed to a change of the rule because I am with the minority. It has been my political fortune generally to have been with a minority. For some reason for several years I had been with the majority party within the limits of State activities before I came here. It was unnatural to me, and when I came to a Democratic Senate I felt like I had arrived once more at headquarters, and was myself again; so it is not merely that. It is because the President, in his statement, has put it upon the unfair ground that the Senate rules prevented this legislation, when his own deferred action caused it. It could have been done months ago. In more than two and one-half years of warfare all this preparation could have been had. But "preparedness" was once an epithet, a word of reproach, until January, 1916, and then came the awakening. The awakening came so rapidly that this bill arrived during the last week of the session, when it was possible for men who differed from the President, by the consumption of time, to prevent its passage.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I ask my colleague if he does not recognize that it was not until the Laconia was sunk, and the circumstances surrounding that occurrence clearly indicated a new danger to the rights of American passengers, American commerce, and ships that might be under the American flag, that the necessity arose for action by the President—will not my colleague admit that the President could not have foreseen that event previous to its happening?

Mr. SHERMAN. He could have foreseen that event, Mr. President, when the neutrality of Belgium was violated.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Laconia was sunk after the President came before Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; that is correct.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the Senators are right as to the time when the President came to Congress, but I am inviting the attention of my colleague to the fact that the demand for the passage of the bill asking the privilege to arm ships was only made absolutely necessary when patience and hope had been exhausted, and the instance of the Laconia clearly indicated that protection to commerce carried by American ships could only be secured by allowing them to arm for defense. How could the extreme necessity be seen sooner, I ask my able colleague?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, Mr. President; that is not the basis. The difficulty is that in all our foreign relations with Germany, as with Mexico, it has been a case of "watchful waiting." The unsuccessful speed is lack of foresight, not excitement after the event has occurred.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Referring to the Laconia proposition, I want to ask the Senator if it is not true that the bill he is talking about, the substitute Senate bill that was pending on the 4th of March when we adjourned, would not have protected any of the American citizens on the Laconia because it was a British ship?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is strictly correct, because it limits the protection of citizens to those found on ships of the United States, registered under our laws.

Mr. NORRIS. That is right.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the bill did not limit it in that way. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] introduced a proposed amendment which would have limited it in that way, if the Senate had adopted it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; the original bill did not contain that amendment, but I had understood that there would be no serious opposition to the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will say, as one member of the committee, that I had never been consulted about that amendment, and I regarded it as the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

Mr. SHERMAN. I so understood it, and believed that if it came to a roll call it would limit the protection of citizens of the United States to those found as passengers or crew on ships of the United States, and not upon the Laconia or any vessel of a belligerent that might similarly be destroyed hereafter.

So I regard it, Mr. President, as an attempt to change the rules by taking advantage of a present emergency, and putting the blame where it does not belong, seeking to absolve the President from the long delay that any person in official life of ordinary foresight could have prevented by urging the desired legislation before the last few weeks or the last few days when it was demanded.

I wish to say—and it is the last time I am going to remark generally on this question—unless by the fortunes of parliamentary warfare it becomes necessary for me to reply to any criticisms made, which I naturally expect if my utterances be thought of enough importance to merit that attention—that the change in the rules will eventually lead to making of the Senate just such a legislative body as the House of Representatives is. It is well enough that a popular body be so, as it represents people. We do not. We represent the sovereignty of the States in which we dwell. We represent those States. It is of no concern how small the State is territorially, or in population, or in business resources. We represent the States primarily.

For that reason this ought to be like no other legislative body in the country. It is a place of common counsel, of revision. Our powers are advisory, diplomatic, and legislative. We discharge all those functions. We are more nearly like the States General of the Netherlands in the time of William the Silent.

A previous question on the ratification of a treaty will be, Mr. President, subject to the same rule. It makes no difference how important, in what kind of a world alliance we are to be placed, the same rule applies. In the fullness of time some kind of a peace league will be formed. When the last shot has been fired the re-creating processes of peace will begin. We earnestly hope that at some time a peace league of enough powers in the world to make such wars as this impossible will be formed. How do the great powers form such a league? The ordinary diplomatic channels negotiate it. It is presented to this body for discussion and for ratification. Sixteen Senators and a two-thirds vote bring it to a roll call at any time that two-thirds think proper. Two-thirds require only 64 Senators—32 States and 64 Senators. Sixteen of the larger States that contain more than 50 per cent of the entire population of the country have no voice; they are voted out. The cloture is applied in that modified form, and the 16 States are voted into silence and oblivion. Any treaty, any legislation of this kind, is made subject to the same coercive rule. Bear in mind that in treaties our powers are advisory to the President and diplomatic in their practical effect. No treaty becomes a law of the land until we ratify it. Therefore why apply such a rule to a question of that kind?

When the question of joining a peace league is presented to the Senate in the future it will involve either our becoming a party with the empires of Europe or of remaining outside. It merits the fullest discussion. It merits the right fully to be heard in that diplomatic capacity before the vote is finally taken, and that is all the old rule of the Senate does.

I know that this resolution will be adopted. Of that I have no doubt. I am saying what I think because I wish to voice my protest against its adoption.

The same gentleman who occupies the executive office was not always of this mind. He, like others who have suddenly wakened to the iniquity of the present rule, once was of the opinion that such a rule was an aid to good government. In Congressional Government, by Woodrow Wilson, on page 211, is the following text:

> An attempt was once made to bring the previous question into the practices of the Senate, but it failed of success, and so that imperative form of cutting off all further discussion has fortunately never found a place there.

Who was it in Holy Writ, with a pious ejaculation, said, "Oh, that mine adversary had written a book?" And he has written not one, but several. I have often quoted pertinent passages from the New Freedom. That seemed to promise a new charter of liberty, a Magna Charta, besides which that wrested from John the First by the old barons of England seems to adopt a diplomatic phrase like a mere scrap of paper. The new charter of freedom, it is true, was written in the ardor of political contest. It sprang Jovelike from his brain, evolved from his inner consciousness before he had executive experience in the White House.

Continuing, on pages 217 and 218, he says:

> Of course, however, there is less temptation to such speech-making in the Senate than in the House. The House knows the terrible possibilities of this sort in store for it were it to give perfect freedom of debate to its 325 members—

Now 435, I might say parenthetically—

> in these days when frequent mails and tireless tongues of telegraphy bring every constituency within earshot of Washington; and it therefore seeks to confine what little discussion it indulges in to the few committeemen specially in charge of the business of each moment. But the Senate is small and of settled habits, and has no such bugbear to trouble it. It (the Senate) can afford to do without any cloture or previous question. No Senator is likely to want to speak on all the topics of the session—> or to prepare more speeches than can conveniently be spoken before adjournment is imperatively at hand.

That sounds liks what I have heard in the classroom—

He did not know what these men would do here in the last days of the session. They prepared more speeches than could conveniently be spoken before adjournment. In fact, even one was left over on the coals that was not used. I do not think, however, upon the whole the Senate is suffering any from the retention of eloquence. All of us can deliver it some other time. There are all the opportunities, even under this resolution, for a person who wishes to talk hours to do so. So the opportunity to talk until permanent relief is obtained is still present. I do not apprehend it will be used until the latter part of the session. Probably if it were not for the vile previous question I would not voice my protest against it. Continuing:

The House can be counted upon to waste enough time to leave some leisure to the upper Chamber.

That is what we are doing, using our leisure. These Senators who are opposed to the bill used the leisure. If the President had only used his leisure and the Senate leaders on the majority side had used their leisure earlier in the session these willful few could not have blocked the passage of the bill. The difficulty is that as in all other human affairs the President's hindsight is a good deal better than his foresight. He is the victim of this incurable propensity of the human mind.

I again quote further this authority, Mr. President. I have all the President's books in my library, some of them very thumbed, especially those on political subjects; some are not so much so, because they are purely theoretical, many of them of an ethical character. On page 219 of this same authority I again quote:

Still though not much heeded.

There was no use of putting that in—

Still, though not much heeded, the debates of the Senate are of great value in scrutinizing and sifting matters which come up from the House. The Senate's opportunities for open and unrestricted discussion and its simple, comparatively unencumbered forms of procedure, unquestionably enable it to fulfill with very considerable success its high functions as a chamber of revision.

That is what this is; but by this day's work a majority of the Senate hereafter will be enabled to apply the previous question on the application of 16 Senators who may represent eight of the smaller States in the Union, and thereafter all further discussion shall be closed. I repeat if the two-thirds majority be provided in this rule and be adopted by a majority the same majority can amend the rule and eliminate the two-thirds, not for the suspension of the rules, but for the adoption of a new rule just as we are now doing.

Mr. President, I shall not take the time of the Senate because I have said in substance all I wish. I am happy to be of the minority. I do not care how overwhelming that minority is, I have voiced my opinion. I am glad I have done so. I intend to vote for the armed-ship bill if an extraordinary session is convened. If you want to send shrapnel and torpedoes and guncotton on American ships, guarded by guns from the Navy and by United States gunners, across the Atlantic Ocean and land by force of arms in a belligerent port these supplies, do so. This seems to be the President's purpose. When he has done so prepare to vote to declare war. When he has done so, stop idly prating of the benevolent neutrality of this Republic; it has ended when the President avails himself of the powers conferred by this bill. When a like steamship shall be loaded and convoyed by the armed forces of the United States—a part of the Navy—across the Atlantic Ocean and landed in a belligerent port, prepare for the same result, because it is sure to rise before us.

Has anybody asked whether the President is likely to use the same power to convoy a boat laden with war supplies to Hamburg or Bremen? Will the President do so? Will he insist that by force of arms war supplies shall leave Baltimore and be landed in Bremen by our naval force? I hardly think he will. We have in fact been unneutral in this administration for many months, not to say years.

I have an article which I prepared several years ago—I am not going to read it—on the question of the practical result of the cloture. By figures and population and votes, to say nothing of material resources, the open forum of the Senate is actually an ally of popular government and not its enemy. It enables the majority of people finally to rule in the Senate by keeping the smaller States, the sparse population, from outvoting the great population in the large States. Senators may not realize that nine States of this Union contain a majority of the entire vote of the Republic. It is so. Those who desire the popular or direct election of President have never stopped to analyze the admitted or the demonstrated result. The popular election of the President or his popular nomination at a primary works out the same way. It would put in the hands of 10 States, at the utmost, the nomination of a President on a direct vote in a primary. If the Electoral College were to be abolished and the popular vote elect, 10 States in the Union will elect the President. Beginning with New York and running across, including Illinois, Iowa, Indiana, Ohio, 10 of them will elect a President. The other 38 States will have no more to say than if they were mere outlying provinces of the German Empire. The open forum in the Senate actually promotes and makes possible the rule of the majority of the population or the voters of this country in the Senate. Still it is universally criticized as the enemy of popular rule.

I ask for leave to insert the article, modified to apply now, entire at the conclusion of my remarks, without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"The filibuster in 1915 in the United States Senate, resulting in the defeat of the shipping bill and the recent defeat of the armed merchant ship bill have provoked a discussion on an amendment of the Senate rules, so as to permit a cloture to be applied on any pending measure. This is proposed to be done whenever a majority of the Senate so votes. It is worthy of observation that the majority party of the Senate in the closing days of the Sixty-third Congress seemed to lack the unanimity required to adopt the cloture. What is the reason? Why do both Republican and Democratic Senators hesitate to close the only open forum in the United States? Now they will close it only when fearing war. It is generally understood that near the close of a session the freedom of discussion, without limit as to time or subject, may be successfully employed to kill a bill. Senatorial history proves that few, if any, meritorious measures have ever been so defeated. If a well-defined public opinion has favored any pending bill, the members of no political party care to take the responsibility of 'talking a bill to death.' It is only when a measure is fairly questionable and no popular verdict has been had that unlimited debate is destructively employed. If a bill is seasonably urged, it can not be so beaten.

"The shipping bill had been through no campaign, neither had it been submitted to the people, the press, discussed, and a verdict returned. The majority party was not sufficiently united to have enacted it if the President's influence and the party caucus had not been invoked.

"There is an underlying reason why Senators upon due reflection decline to close free discussion in the Senate by an amendment in the nature of a cloture. The House of Representatives is the direct agent of the people. Its membership is measured by mere population. An apportionment bill recasting the ratio and increasing the membership is had at 10-year intervals corresponding with the regular decennial census. The original ratio was 1 Member of the House of Representatives for every 30,000 population. This was fixed in the Constitution. In 1790 it was raised to 33,000. This ratio has uniformly increased from 33,000 until it was fixed, in 1910, at 211,407. The ratio has been raised in order to prevent the House from becoming unwieldly by mere size. Still it remains the popular body and directly represents the people. It was so intended when created by the Constitution.

"The Senate is not based upon population. The census returns may rise or fall but—

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof for six years, and each Senator shall have one vote.

"The foregoing is the language of the seventeeth amendment to the Federal Constitution. It provides for the direct election of Senators instead of the election by State legislatures as originally written. Senators are neither apportioned nor elected so as to represent mere population, although in a limited sense they are representative of the people residing in the States which elect them, and in a broader sense of all the people of the Republic. The number of Senators, however, is dependent solely on the number of States. The Senate represents the units known as States without regard to the number of people which may inhabit them. However much or little the population of a State may be it is on an equality with each of the other States of the Union. The Senate can not increase in numbers unless new States are created and admitted to the Union, and then such new State becomes automatically entitled to two Senators under existing constitutional provisions. The sovereignty or governmental individuality of the State, except in the broader sense alluded to, determines the number of the Senate, and the number of qualified voters whether large or small is merely the elective power. Territory, people, agriculture, commerce, manufacturing, or banking, whatever their character or importance, do not increase or decrease by so much as a single vote the voting power of a State in the Senate.

"The supporters of the ship-purchase bill said a majority was prevented from legislating and that popular government was thwarted. A majority of what, the people or of the smaller States? Of the 42 Senators from the 21 States of Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Indiana, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, Nevada, New Jersey, North Carolina, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia, 36 Democratic Senators voted for the shipping bill in its various parliamentary stages and 6 against it. Of the 6 Senators so voting against it 5 were Democrats from the normally Democratic States of Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Kentucky, and Mississippi, and 1, a Republican from the doubtful State of Delaware.

"Of the 36 Senators from the second group of 18 States—Connecticut, Idaho, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Michigan, Minnesota, New Hampshire, New Mexico, New York, North Dakota, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Utah, Vermont, Washington, and Wyoming—30 Republicans voted against it in its several parliamentary stages and 4 Democrats, 1 from each of the States of Illinois, Kansas, New Hampshire, and Ohio, all of which are normally Republican States, and were so carried in 1914, voted for the bill. One Progressive from the State of Washington, which went Republican in 1914, and may ordinarily be so regarded, was doubtful or voted against it in its final stages, and 1 Democrat from the State of New York voted against it.

"Of the 18 Senators from the third group of 9 States—California, Colorado, Maine, Massachusetts, Nebraska, South Dakota, Oregon, Wisconsin, and West Virginia—9 Republicans and 1 Democrat voted against it and 6 Democrats and 2 Republicans voted for it. The 9 Republicans were from California, Maine, Massachusetts, South Dakota, Wisconsin, and West Virginia, and the 1 Democrat was from Nebraska. The 6 Democrats who voted for it were from Colorado, Maine, Oregon, and West Virginia, and the 2 Republicans were 1 each from Nebraska and Wisconsin.

"For the purpose of testing the popular strength lying back of the senatorial votes, the first group of 21 States will be regarded as all Democratic. Eight of those States, however, are fighting ground, viz, Delaware, Indiana, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Montana, Nevada, and New Jersey.

"The total population of these 21 States, by the census of 1910, is 37,030,802. The total vote cast in these 21 States in 1912 was 4,314,496. The total Democratic vote cast in 1912 in these States was 2,339,191.

"The second group of 18 States may be regarded as all Republican. The largest States of the Union lie in this group. It is significant that the four largest States in both population and votes, the latter including no female votes in the figures used, namely, New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, and Ohio, all returned decisive Republican majorities in 1914.

"The total population of the 18 States by the census of 1910 was 41,321,180.

"The total vote cast in the 18 States in 1912, 7,987,465.

"The total popular vote cast in the 18 States in 1912 for Taft and Roosevelt was 4,398,751.

"The third group of nine States contains five which elected Democratic Senators in 1914 by a direct vote of the people: California, Oregon, Colorado, Wisconsin, and South Dakota.

"Omitting any reference to California, which elected Progressive and Republican governors, respectively, in 1914, and Republican factional divisions in South Dakota and Wisconsin, giving the election to the Democratic senatorial candidate by close pluralities, and the personal popularity of the Democratic candidates in Oregon, although all three of Oregon's congressional districts elected Republicans, they may all be considered, even by Democrats, as debatable ground. Massachusetts is a conspicuous example, electing Republicans in 12 out of 16 congressional districts and a State legislature Republican in both branches, with its Progressive vote of 142,228 in 1912, which gave the State to the Democrats, reduced to 32,145 in 1912. So far as recent votes can be made significant this State's two Senators are both justified in voting against the shipping bill, and Massachusetts might properly be put in the second group as a Republican State, thus effectively demonstrating that popular strength is against the bill. From the Republican viewpoint all five are naturally Republican, and on the shipping bill issue would be so regarded by that party.

The total population of the 9 States, census 1910, was	13,289,206
The total vote cast in the 9 States in 1912 was	2,729,208
The total Democratic vote cast in the 9 States in 1912 was	1,104,477
The total Taft and Roosevelt vote cast in the 9 States in 1912 was	1,377,958
The 36 Democratic Senators of the first group of States voting for the shipping bill represented a population of	37,030,802
The 30 Republican Senators and 1 Progressive Senator of the second group voting against the bill represented a population of	41,321,189
Or, the 30 Republican and 1 Progressive Senators of the second group voting against the bill represented population exceeding that of the first group represented by 36 Democratic Senators voting for the bill by	4,290,387
The total vote cast in the first group of 21 Democratic States was	4,314,496
The total vote cast in the second group of 18 Republican States was	7,987,465
Or, the second group of 18 Republican States cast an excess of votes over the first group of 21 Democratic States of	3,672,969

"The third group of 9 States classified as doubtful, with their population of 13,289,206 as against the first group of 21 States classified as Democratic, with a population of 37,020,797, cast a total vote of 2,729,208 as against a total vote of 4,314,496 in the 21 States or, reduced to percentages, less than 12 per cent (11.65) of the population of the first group voted as against over 20 per cent (20.5) of the third group. If the first group be subdivided into the solidly Democratic States of Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia it will be observed that they constitute a majority of 11 out of 21 States, containing 22 out of a total of 42 Senators. Under party caucus action they rule the group of great Democratic States. Those 11 States contain a population of 22,392,414. The total vote cast in the 11 States in 1912 was 1,540,514, or less than 7 per cent (6.88) of the population. If popular government is invoked to help the shipping bill let the 11 Republican States of New York, Ohio, Minnesota, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Michigan, Kansas, North Dakota, Illinois, Iowa, and Washington in group two, with an aggregate population of 38,819,849, be pitted against the 22,392,414 population of the 11 States in group one. The 11 Republican States named cast a total vote in 1912 of 7,447,089, or over 19 per cent (19.18), against less than 7 per cent of the population of the 11 Democratic States. Less than 8 per cent (7.74) of the population of Texas voted, while more than 20 per cent (20.3) of the population of Illinois voted. The male vote cast in each State is the basis of computation. Still the cloture is demanded in the name of popular government.

"The foregoing analysis disposes of the claim that popular government was defied and the rule of the people outraged in defeating the shipping bill. The filibuster and the Senate rules became the ally of popular rule and not its enemy. If mere population or voting strength is the test, the bill was beaten by Senators who represented a decisive majority of the people of the United States.

"The strength of the support for the bill came from small States with their equal suffrage with the large States and States in which a comparatively small per cent of its population votes. It is one of the paradoxes of government that the cloture in the Senate, instead of promoting the rule of the majority, would become an instrument of legislation by the minority. This is because of the equal vote of the small and the large States in the Senate. New York, with 9,113,614 people and 1,587,693 votes, has but two Senators, both voting against the shipping bill, while Nevada, with 81,875 people and 20,115 votes, has two Senators who voted for it, or Arizona, with 204,354 people and 23,722 votes, has two Senators who voted for the bill, as against the great population of New York or that of Pennsylvania or Illinois, with 7,665,111 and 5,638,591, respectively. On a representative population basis, the two Senators from New York have more than one hundred and eleven times the population back of them the two Senators from Nevada have, and on a voting basis over seventy-eight times as much. Our scheme of Federal Government made it so from the beginning. The relative importance of the small States as original sovereignties could be preserved in no other way to which they would consent, and so the Union was formed with the representation of States in the Senate, each having an equal vote. This provision of the Constitution is unamendable. Nothing but the sword can involuntarily deprive the small States of their equal voting power in the Senate. The United States is therefore not exclusively a people's government. It is one of the States and the people. No change can eliminate this double nature save by the unanimous consent of every State. If a single State refused its consent, nothing but military force could coerce it into remaining in the Union changed so as to deprive it of its equal power in the Senate. Those who talk of a pure democracy and the abolition of the Senate have not studied well the foundations of the Federal Government. Such a scheme is either a chimera or a revolution. If only people be considered, then why should the numerically small and less populous States destroy by a combined vote the great centers of population? If this were a pure democracy the smaller States would themselves in turn, in a direct vote, be extinguished if the large States combined. The small States realize this. When the Constitution was framed their delegates then voiced their fears in the constitutional convention. They urged that the sovereignty of the small State would be submerged in the populous large States, so the small States have, as an indispensable condition, first, in the drafting of the Constitution, and second, in its ratification preserved their separate sovereignties in the Senate. This is zealously guarded in Article V, which provides—

"That no State without its consent shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

"It is noticeable that this safeguard is written in the article concerning amendments to the Constitution. The language quoted is a prohibition upon the power of three-fourths of the States ratifying an amendment to destroy the equal suffrage of any State in the Senate. I believe this limitation upon the right of amendment puts it beyond the power of the people or the States themselves to destroy the equal representation in the Senate of each State, whatever its population or the importance of its occupations, without its consent.

"The manufacturing of New York State alone equals that of 29 other States; Pennsylvania that of 27 other States; Illinois, 23 other States; and Massachusetts and Ohio each that of 20 and 19 other States, respectively. The relative values of the agricultural productions of the States in the several groups show an overwhelming preponderance in the States whose Senators opposed the bill or that went solidly against the administration at the November, 1914, elections. Even the total cotton production coming entirely from the 11 States found in the first group is about equaled in value by the hay crop of the United States, while the corn crop of the country is double that of the cotton crop for the export of which the bill was supposed to provide. New York State bank deposits are more than those of 33 other States. The deposits of Massachusetts equal that of 20 other States, and Pennsylvania and Illinois each that of 17 other States.

"If the occupations followed by the people of the several States are considered, neither can that majority in the Senate fairly claim to represent the immense volume of business and productive transactions of the larger States who are in a hopeless minority on a roll call of Senators. This peculiar condition which prevails in no other legislative body in the United States is another reason for the open forum in the Senate. It is a potent argument against the cloture. The artificial character of the representation in the Senate is met in certain emergencies by unlimited debate. Whatever names may be employed do not change the basic conditions. Filibuster is an offensive epithet to some ears. It is used to frighten some candidates for public office. It is the theme for denunciation by a certain element of the public press and by some well-meaning persons. Nevertheless, the filibuster in its crudest form is never as arbitrary as the majority in the Senate resulting from the equal suffrage of the smaller States. The Constitution probably could not have been framed and ratified unless this foundation of the Senate had been laid on a consenting constituency of States. It has preserved the States, and none of them would consider for an instant its surrender of its equal power in the Senate.

"Other powerful reasons exist. The party caucuses flourish in the majority party in the Senate. Whatever names may be employed to cover the proceedings, nevertheless it remains with all that the term implies. The Democratic Party of late years ceased to use the word 'caucus.' It has substituted the more euphonious terms of 'conference' of Democratic Senators on the shipping bill, in which King Caucus was supposed to be dethroned; all who attended it were intended to be bound by its iron rule. The recent extended and indignant denunciation of Democratic Senators who did not abide by the caucus action of their party by the Democratic administration Senators is an instance that within the internal mechanism of a conference there beats the sturdy heart of caucus rule. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is filled with criticisms of Democratic Senators who would not be so bound. They have been characterized as Judases. They have been read out of the party so far as the action of individual Senators can do so, and in other ways it has been attempted to make them feel the weight of the majority's displeasure. On a roll call in caucus the combination of small States can outvote and muzzle completely the larger States, so caucus rule thereby becomes misrepresentative of popular government.

"Added to the foregoing is the Executive encroachment. The President wishes to be on good terms with the Senators from the small States as well as those from the large States. This wish, however, is not so ardent as the wish of the two Senators from those States to be in accord with the President who is of their party. It is needless to insist that patronage does not play a large part in the mutual adjustment between the Senators of the smaller States and the President. It tightens the hold of the President on the Senators. This makes it comparatively easy for a President to control a caucus of the majority party. When this caucus action is joined with the tremendous power already in the hands of the Executive it can be realized why the President so often controls Congress. The only successful opposition to the vast power of the President is the open forum of the Senate. The cloture in the Senate becomes the ally of Executive usurpation and caucus rule. It is another reactionary movement masquerading in the name of reform.

"The Senate has been equal to its responsibility in time of trial. It is the only barrier in the way of supreme Executive control in the United States. If a cloture is adopted in the Senate, that barrier is swept aside. Hasty or injurious legislation is thereby made more possible than at present. History has demonstrated that Presidents may err. We acknowledge their sincerity and patriotism. We have a right, however, in the Senate at least to question their infallibility. It is there that the Executive measures are tested, tried, and in the open forum of the Senate approved or rejected. If this be a filibuster, let Senators and the people manfully acknowledge that it is justified under our plan of government so long as present practices continue. The filibuster is a proper corrective to caucus or conference action, the overshadowing influence of the President, and the dual system of national government by population and by States. The open forum in the Senate is an antidote developed by experience in the actual processes of the parliamentary operations in the Senate."

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I believe a majority of the Senators on both sides of the Chamber, realizing the imminence of a vital national emergency, are sincerely desirous of reaching a solution of the cloture question which will give fair opportunity for debate and at the same time insure reasonable promptness of action. There is a broad twilight zone between unlimited debate and no debate; between headlong action and utter stagnation.

The majority in the Senate are prone to impatience. Knowing that they have the votes they are eager for action. They are quick to paste the filibuster label on extended debate by the minority. They are likely to overlook windy speeches on their own side of the aisle.

The minority, on the other hand, are extremely jealous of their rights. Knowing that the votes are against them and being strongly opposed to the inevitable result that a vote will insure, they naturally postpone the evil day. They are certainly in no hurry to help their opponents gain the credit for a conspicuously fine record of achievement.

Moreover, the minority feels a certain satisfaction in exercising its privileges to the discomfort of its opponents. It appeals to the gallery when the leader of a small minority shakes his fist at the majority and proudly announces that curfew shall not ring to-night. It consoles the minority somewhat for the defeat that has compelled its party to step back from the front and forego the bestowal of the political spoils.

This criticism is made amiably and without partisan bias. It applies as well to the Democratic as to the Republican Party. The dominant party usually favors cloture; the minority party opposes it.

But when a national crisis is actually upon us, when there is urgent necessity for quick and effective action, when the public is interested enough to indulge in the diverting but somewhat significant pastime of burning in effigy those who are supposed to be responsible for the delay, party lines largely disappear and we are able to join hands in a patriotic service.

I feel safe in assuming that a cloture rule will soon result from our deliberations. We have the unsual spectacle of a joint conference of committees representing both parties in the Senate. We have a substantial and, for aught I know, a unanimous agreement in that joint conference. It is fair to assume that the recommendation is so conservative that all the members of the joint conference can conscientiously support it. If that be so, it is probably too conservative.

The proposed rule will place an indefinite end to debate when two-thirds of those present and voting so decide. I say "indefinite end," because not even a two-thirds majority will have the power to set a definite time for a vote. Each member will thereafter have a right to speak a full hour on the pending question. If every Senator avails himself of the privilege this will mean more than two weeks of the usual sittings of the Senate.

I take the ground that a debate of two weeks is ample for the discussion of any measure in the Senate. I take the ground that one hour is as much as any Senator should debate any subject anywhere at any time. If it is apparent that any Senator is particularly well informed or has a special message to deliver, unanimous consent to extend his time may readily be obtained.

My point is that there is no virtue in requiring a two-thirds vote to invoke the imposition of a cloture rule permitting each Senator thereafter to talk as much as any Senator ought ever to talk. To listen to talk until the senatorial appetite for eloquence is satisfied, and then permit further talk at the risk of senatorial surfeit and even nausea, is ridiculous—in most cases it is barbarous.

A bare majority ought to be sufficient to set the slow wheels to moving so that the journey's end must be reached at the end of a fortnight. What Senator would be willing to serve his country to the extent of riding from Washington to Pasadena, from Pasadena to Seattle, and from Seattle back to Washington, and be talked to six hours a day on one subject by the best talkers in Christendom? The senatorial salary of $20 a day would be grossly inadequate for such an imposition.

We believe in majority rule in this country. A bare majority is sufficient to elect any Senator to this body. A bare majority is sufficient to pass any measure when a vote is reached, except an amendment to the Constitution.

In the recent election a President was elected because a single State voted for one candidate instead of his opponent, and a plurality, not even a majority, was enough to swing the vote of that State.

We take ourselves too seriously when we insist upon a two-thirds vote to set the wheels in motion for our fortnight's tapering off. We liken ourselves in solemnity to the United States Constitution. A bare majority is sufficient, in all conscience.

I shall vote for the two-thirds rule if the Senate rejects the majority rule, but I think the country should know how the Senate stands on the proposition. I therefore move to amend the resolution by striking out the words "two-thirds" in the fourteenth line and inserting in place thereof the word "majority."

Mr. President, I offer this amendment because I feel that I ought to do so. If any Member of the Senate desires to close debate on the subject—and I sincerely believe that every Member here knows whether or not he favors a majority vote or a two-thirds vote on the question of cloture—and moves to lay the amendment on the table, I shall be entirely content with that motion.

Mr. PENROSE. I simply wish to say that, in my opinion, the motion made by the Senator from New Hampshire is a breach of good faith.

Mr. HOLLIS. I should like to inquire from the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania why it is a breach of good faith?

Mr. PENROSE. Because the minority were officially, or semi-officially informed, at least in the newspapers, that the Democratic conference, and we knew that the Republican conference had with practical unanimity agreed on the resolution in its present form. I do not think unanimous consent could have been obtained for any other than the pending proposition. I know that I myself should have objected to any other.

Mr. HOLLIS. I am very glad to hear the views of the distinguished Senator touching the newspapers. In a similar situation he complained because he was not notified of certain nominations which were made, and in reply to the statement that the whole matter was in the newspapers, the Senator entirely repelled the idea.

Now, speaking for myself, I have never been notified, directly or indirectly, of any unanimous-consent agreement on the subject. I have not attended any meeting where a vote of the kind was taken. I have not attended any meeting where the matter was up for consideration.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia and Mr. NORRIS addressed the Chair.

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield the floor, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JAMES in the chair). The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I regret that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] has submitted this amendment. I think that we are bound by our agreement. I think there was practically a unanimous agreement in the Democratic conference to support this rule as it has been written. I thought the Senator from New Hampshire was present and participated in the agreement. I am sure that it is true that a committee of five Members from each conference conferred upon the subject, and agreed to recommend to their respective conferences the amendment to the rule which has been submitted. Under the circumstances, Mr. President, I move to lay the amendment upon the table.

Mr. HOLLIS rose.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. One moment. I withdraw the motion for the present. I think the Senator from New Hampshire, if he will reflect a little, even though he might not himself have been present and no binding agreement was made, will feel as I do, that we are bound by the understanding, that we have been proceeding upon that theory, and obtained the unanimous consent of the Senate for consideration to-day of the resolution. I know I had a small amendment which I desired to add to the proposition, but we determined to withhold it and not to offer it.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I do not recognize that I am bound by any rule adopted by any body of men when I am not present and do not know about a matter, and of which I have not been informed. That is a matter of party management, and I have no criticism to make; but I do not care to be bound by it. However, at the request of the Democratic leader, the distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, while I should have voted against the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], I think it was perfectly proper for him to offer it; and if a majority of the Senate think that cloture should be applied by a majority vote, instead of a two-thirds vote, his amendment ought to have been agreed to. I do not believe that any Senator is bound to vote against any amendment to this proposed rule which he thinks would improve it; but that is neither here nor there, Mr. President. I want to say a few words on the resolution itself.

Ever since I have been a Member of this body I have favored some kind of a cloture rule that would be reasonable. I would be opposed to the same kind of a cloture rule in a body of this size which I would favor, for instance, in the House of Representatives, whose membership is very much larger; but it has always seemed to me, Mr. President, that there ought to come a time in every debate on every question when, under the rules of the body, the majority could have its way. Under the rules as they now are we seldom reach a vote on a hotly-contested proposition until after a contest of physical endurance. This is not a fair or wise method of reaching a conclusion on any subject.

I am not one of those who believe it best to change a rule for a particular bill. I am in favor of this kind of a rule, because I believe in it as a general proposition. I have favored it when many of those who are now trying to secure it were bitterly opposed to it. I have been assailed often because I thought there ought to be some rule of the Senate by which debate could be brought to a close. I have always believed, however, that, whatever the rule was, every individual Senator ought to be permitted in his own right to debate the proposition, the same as any other Senator. I have always opposed any change of the rule that would give any majority, no matter how large, the right absolutely to close debate and permit no one to be heard further, because under that kind of a rule Members of the Senate could absolutely be precluded even from expressing an opinion on any pending measure. But this rule, Mr. President, goes only to a reasonable extent. It requires, in the first place, a two-thirds vote to invoke the rule, and after it is invoked every Senator has a right to speak one hour on the bill and the amendments, which, I take it from the language of the proposed rule, will mean that he can divide that hour as he sees fit—use it all on the bill, all on one amendment, or divide it up according to his own idea and his own judgment. To my mind, that is a reasonable proposition. I do not think those who favor the general proposition of a reasonable cloture can object to this proposed rule on account of its being unreasonable. I would not have any objection if, instead of an hour, it provided for two hours of debate by each Senator, because I think in practical application it would be about the same. It never occurs that every Senator desires to speak on any one measure.

In every filibuster that takes place those who are doing the filibustering are always in the minority. It would not be necessary to filibuster, of course, if they were not in the minority. If they had the votes to defeat the bill, then, of course, they would not object to an immediate vote. So that what happens is that those who are opposed and who are in the minority do most of the talking, as a rule, when there is a genuine filibuster on, and it is a pretty good criterion to go by when one wants to ascertain whether or not a filibuster is taking place to see whether those who favor the bill are doing the talking or whether it is being done by those who are opposed to it, and whether those who oppose it are resorting to various dilatory motions and points of order that can always be made in a parliamentary struggle. In the President's bill which failed on March 4 there was no filibuster. The supporters of the bill took most of the time. Those who opposed the bill never once made a dilatory motion, never once suggested the absence of a quorum, never even moved to adjourn or demanded a roll call. The real fact is that legitimate debate was never exhausted.

Mr. President, I favor this proposed modification of the rules, because I have always stood for a proposition of this kind. I have on several occasions addressed the Senate on the subject, and I have introduced several proposed amendments to the rules that came very near complying with all the requirements contained in the proposed rule now under consideration. I wanted to say this much in defense of my own position.

I was one of the Senators who was opposed to the bill that was pending when Congress adjourned on the 4th of March. I spoke against it for something over an hour. I was accused of filibustering, something that I denied then and something that I deny now, although I believe that if the bill unamended were before the Senate at any time, and under any rule of the Senate that permitted a filibuster, I could defeat it, I would not hesitate to do so. I do not want anybody to understand that I am making any apology. It was not necessary to filibuster. Legitimate debate was never ended, and, Mr. President, at some time, perhaps when the bill comes up in the no distant future, I am going into that somewhat at length; but I do not care to do so now. I would not have mentioned it now had it not been referred to by others. I want to discuss the real question before the Senate.

But, Mr. President, those who opposed that bill in its unamended form, and who refused to be coerced by the Executive, were denounced by the President of the United States I think wrongfully, without cause, without reason, and contrary to the real facts. What they said and what they did in defense of their convictions on the floor of the Senate never reached the people of the United States. What the President said and what those said who favored the legislation was carried by the newspapers and spread broadcast, but the real issue, as the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] has said, was never told; it was never said that most of those who were opposed to that legislation were in favor of some kind of legislation, wanted legislation, wanted that bill if it could be amended in some particular form, but were opposed to giving, as that unamended bill did, the enormous power sought to be lodged in the hands of the President of the United States—a power greater than that possessed by any monarch on earth, a power that gives to the President of our country the right to make war at his own sweet will.

It was said by the President that it was useless to call Congress in special session, because the same means by which the bill was killed once would kill it again. I had an idea that the President knew more about the history and the conditions of the Senate than that. I think everybody realized then, and realizes now, that even if the rules were not changed and a special session of Congress were called to pass that legislation, it would be passed through the Senate in less than three days. Everybody knows it. Those who were opposing it knew it. They have never denied it; they have always realized it. It could not be talked to death, although I would talk it to death if I could; it could not be killed by dilatory tactics, because there would be no 4th of March just a day or two ahead, when, under the Constitution, the Senate must adjourn.

I am saying only what every Senator knows, but the President of the United States has said to the people of the United States that a special session could not pass the bill, although Congress is almost unanimously for it, because a few men could kill it under the rules of the Senate. That is absolutely a mistake. Mr. President, the President is wrong about that, and when he looks into it, if he ever does, he will discover that he is wrong. He is mistaken. That bill could be passed just as quickly, if Senators wanted to resort to a speaking tournament, as this proposed rule can be passed. You are going to pass a rule that will be a cloture in effect, and yet you are considering that rule right now with unlimited debate, with the right to talk forever, if some Senator can talk that long, and the right to filibuster, if any Senator desires to resort to that method. If Senators could defeat that bill in the way the President suggests they could defeat this proposed rule in the same way and so leave the rules as they are and then defeat the bill when the special session shall have been called. The same filibuster which would kill the bill would kill the rule and thus enable a filibuster to kill the bill. Everybody knows that. The President ought to know it.

I do not know whether the country will ever find out what the truth is, but some student of history some day, perhaps after we are dead, will discover that the President of the United States did a great wrong to men who were conscientiously trying to do their duty as they saw it The only reason why I dislike to vote for this proposed rule now, one that I have favored for years, is because I fear I may be misunderstood in voting for it. I have stood for it when the President of the United States was silent; I have stood for it when men here who are backing it up and demanding that it be passed were opposed to any such change; but now a great leader has spoken, and a certain class of people obey him now, as they always have and always will.

I congratulate the President in getting right on the rules question, in seeing that there ought to be a change of the rules. I am glad he has come over to the ground that I have occupied for four years. With his great influence behind the movement, the rules are going to be changed. It will never affect the particular legislation one iota, however, because, as I said, you could pass this bill just as quickly as you could pass this rule, if anybody wanted to do his best to talk it to death or to filibuster against its passage.

It would be interesting to show the exact legislative condition in the Senate when the President's pet bill was brought up for consideration. It was on the 2d day of March, late in the afternoon, and Congress would die March 4—less than two days from the time the bill was first taken up. It seems to me I ought to call your attention briefly to a few things at this time.

On that day, March 2, there was in conference the Navy bill, which, as it was reported to the Senate from the committee, carried $535,753,447.08.

There was in conference the District appropriation bill. As it was reported to the Senate it carried $14,860,558.66.

There was in conference the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. As it came to the Senate it carried $39,815,302.42.

The Agricultural appropriation bill was in conference, and, as it was reported to the Senate, it carried $25,454,623.

The river and harbor bill was another bill that a great many Senators wanted to pass. It died. It had not even been considered by the Senate. I am glad that it died in the condition it was in. I think, by preventing its passage, those who did it performed a good service to their country.

The pension appropriation bill was in conference, and, as it was reported to the Senate, it carried $163,065,000.

The Indian appropriation bill was in conference on that day, and, as it came to the Senate, it carried $12,435,114.05.

The Post Office appropriation bill was in conference on that day. I have not the figures as to how much it carried.

Mr. PENROSE. About $330,000,000.

Mr. NORRIS. Three hundred and thirty million dollars, the Senator says. Now, I have not had time, but I wish you would add up all those millions—all of them in conference.

That is not the worst of it, Mr. President. There were seven or eight other bills in conference that were passed; and the conference reports on these bills that I have named, that were in conference at that time, with the exception of the river and harbor bill, where all agreed to after this famous bill was taken up in the Senate on the 2d day of March. The naval appropriation bill was brought up twice. All that was done between the 2d and the 4th of March.

Mr. President, that was not all. On the 2d day of March, when this bill that has been so strenuously demanded was brought into the Senate, the Army appropriation bill had never passed the Senate. It had never been considered by the Senate. It had simply been reported from the Senate committee. It carried, as reported, $278,186,496.02.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JAMES in the Chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator should add about $100,000,000 to that, because the bill carried as a rider a scheme for universal military training.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator. I did not know how much more that would cost, but I was going to call attention to it.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, that is an estimate, of course.

Mr. NORRIS. That is an estimate.

Mr. THOMAS. I should say that is my estimate.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, Mr. President, think of that. There were two days left. That one bill carrying over $278,000,000 in appropriations—and, as the Senator from Colorado says, carrying a universal-training legislative proposition which involved billions of dollars—had not even been considered. Now, it does not make any difference which side of the question of universal military training you are on; you must concede that it is a debatable proposition. Whether you favor universal military training or not, you must admit that the question has two sides; and if you had nothing else to do, you could not dispose of that question, and treat it fairly, in two days. Why, it is an impossibility.

Let us take another one. The general deficiency bill, carrying $62,598,279.67, had not even reached the Senate on that day. It had not gotten here. I do not know whether it had passed the House, even, at that time.

The Military Academy bill had not even been reported to the Senate at that time. That carried an appropriation of $1,348,496.18.

There was the sundry civil bill, one of the greatest appropriation bills that we consider, one that appropriates money for every part of the entire United States, not even considered. As the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] says, it had not even been reported by the committee at the time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. How much did that carry?

Mr. NORRIS. The sundry civil bill carried $139,028,513.77.

Now, I have added together those bills that had not even been considered by the Senate, every one of which had to be passed before noon on the 4th day of March, or an extra session was inevitable.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. There were two deficiency bills.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; it is suggested that there was another deficiency bill that I have not even mentioned, that was not considered. I do not know how many millions that carried. I have gathered these figures together hurriedly at my desk while this debate has been going on.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who is on the committee, says the other bill that I have omitted carried about $80,000,000. I am going to count it as $80,000,000, and then see what we will get. That will make, Mr. President, appropriation bills that at that day had never even been taken up by the Senate amounting to $560,861,785.64; and yet you say that a man who will interfere with the putting through of that program in two days is a filibusterer and sometimes a traitor to his country!

Mr. President, in addition to these conference reports, as I said, there were conference reports on a great many other bills. They were taken up between the time this bill came up and noon on the 4th day of March. They were considered. They were passed.

I want to make this assertion, and I believe that upon full investigation it will be found to be justified: If you will take the very day that this bill was brought up before the Senate, the necessary appropriation bills that never had been considered by the Senate—and that does not include the river and harbor bill; I will exclude that because everybody concedes that that is not necessary to keep the Government going—if you will just take those other appropriation bills that I have mentioned, and the conference reports that actually did come in, and that were necessary to come in, and if you will assume that the Secretary of the Senate should work 12 hours a day without stopping, without eating, without drinking, he could not even have read those bills in the time that was left between the time this bill came up and noon on the 4th day of March. It would have been a physical impossibility. And yet we are called upon to put them through without reading, by unanimous consent, or else we will bring on a special session and not be patriotic!

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that in addition to this great accumulation of supply bills there was pending a great program of bills of the first importance which were being urged by the administration, such as the bill for increasing the membership of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the bill authorizing the maintenance of common buying and selling agencies in export trade, called the Webb bill, the great water-power bill, the bill dealing with the question of strikes and lockouts upon railroads, and the commandeering of railroads by the President in time of national emergency.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And the conservation bills.

Mr. NORRIS. And the so-called conservation bills, as the Senator from Connecticut suggests. They all failed.

Mr. WATSON. The bill conferring great additional power on the shipping board.

Mr. NORRIS. And the shipping board bill, as the Senator from Indiana suggests; and I have no doubt that list could be doubled if some care were taken to investigate the matter. They were all defeated, and there was no filibuster against any one of them.

Mr. GRONNA. I trust the Senator will not forget the banking bill, which the chairman of the Federal Reserve Board said it was absolutely necessary to have passed.

Mr. NORRIS. I was speaking of these appropriation bills that everybody knows must become law, or a special session must result; the Government can not run without them. I thank the Senators for calling attention to those other bills. The President mentions some of those in this statement in which he denounces the Members of the Senate. He evidently thought we ought to have passed those bills, because he mentioned them.

I will take one of these conservation bills, the water-power bill. Mr. President, I happen to be on the Committee on Public Lands. The President said, in that statement, that the House had passed those conservation bills. There were two water-power bills, one applying to water power on navigable streams, and one applying to water power on the public domain. The House did pass those bills. The Senate failed to pass them. Evidently the President was satisfied from that statement with the bills as they passed the House. I was likewise. I was on that committee, to which one of those bills was referred. I favored the bill substantially as it came from the House, but I was outvoted in that committee. The President had his men on that committee, members of his party, who were in control of it. They refused to accept the House bill. They reported out a substitute bill—the Myers bill—to which I was opposed, and to which I judge, from what the President has said in his statement, that he, too, must have been opposed.

But now let us take the other water-power bill. It was known in the Senate as the Shields bill. That bill did pass the Senate, and if you will look at the RECORD you will find a great many of us fighting that bill from the beginning to the end. I did everything I could to defeat it in the Senate. I took more time on it than I did on this bill that failed on the 4th of March. I took twice as much time on it. Nobody suggested then that I was filibustering; but I failed. The Shields bill was passed. I voted against it.

Now, let us see what happened later. The newspapers announced one day that the President had come up here and had gotten hold of some of his Democratic friends, and particularly those who were behind the Shields bill, and was demanding that they "lay down" and let the House bill prevail. We know what happened here. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] rose in his place the next morning and read that article out of the newspaper and denounced it as false in toto, excepting that the President had been here and had seen him; and then he announced that the President had said that he was in favor of the Shields bill. Now, how does that compare with the President's statement? I was opposed to the Shields bill. I supposed, until I heard the Senator from Alabama make this statement, that the President was opposed to it.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. NORRIS. I do.

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not understand. Does the Senator say that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] said that the President was for the bill?

Mr. NORRIS. I understood him so to say. I wish somebody would get the RECORD of that day, and I will read just what he did say.

Mr. SHIELDS. My recollection is that he stated that the President said he was not opposed to the bill, but that he had urged the conferees to get together and agree upon a good bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; he did say that he urged them to get together.

Mr. SHIELDS. And he offered no direct and definite opinion upon the differences.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, I should like to read just what the Senator said. If somebody will look that up while I am talking I will read it. I do not want to make any statement here that is not borne out by the facts, because I have no knowledge on the subject excepting what I heard. It occurred to me, though, that even if he did say to the Senator from Alabama that he was opposed to the Shields bill——

Mr. SHIELDS. He did not say that he was opposed to it.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, then, he can not square his conduct with the statement that he gave to the papers, because he left the impression there that he was in favor of the House bill and not the Senate bill, and condemned the Senate because it had not passed the House bill.

Mr. SHIELDS. When did the President give out any such statement to the newspapers?

Mr. NORRIS. Why, part of it has been read here this morning. He gave it out on the morning of the 5th of March, I think. That was the day when it was published in the newspapers.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The evening of March 5.

Mr. NORRIS. If somebody will get me the statement I will read it.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have no recollection of any such statement.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, let us see what he said.

Mr. SHIELDS. The President always favored some legislation upon this subject.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. But I never knew him to indorse directly either bill; but he left it to the Congress to work it out, as it should have done. In my own opinion, he ought to have indorsed the Shields bill.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not finding fault with the Senator from Tennessee if he thinks that. The Senator from Tennessee has always believed in the Shields bill. He is conscientious about it, and I concede that it is a question of two sides. I did not agree with the Senator, but the Senator had his way. He passed his bill. [Reading:]

"It would not cure the difficulty," says the President, "to call the Sixty-fifth Congress in extra session.
"The paralysis of the Senate would remain."

Mr. SHIELDS. May I ask from what the Senator is reading.

Mr. NORRIS. I am reading from the President's statement, printed in the Washington Post on March 5, 1917.

The opposition of one or two Senators has made it impossible to increase the membership of the Interstate Commerce Commission or to give it the altered organization necessary for its efficiency.
The conservation bill, which should have released for immediate use the mineral resources which are still locked up in the public lands, now that their release is more imperatively necessary than ever, and the bill which would have made the unused water power of the country immediately available for industry, have both failed, though they have been under consideration throughout the sessions of two Congresses and have been twice passed by the House of Representatives.

Then it goes on:

The appropriations for the Army—

I will read that, too, because that has particular application to an Army bill that was not reported until after his pet bill was taken up and was never considered by the Senate.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment. Let me finish reading this:

The appropriations for the Army have failed, along with the appropriations for the civil establishment of the Government, the appropriations for the Military Academy at West Point, and the general deficiency bill.

These are the bills I mentioned before, but the particular thing in point now is what he said in his statement about the water-power bills. From his statement no other conclusion can be reached than that the President is in favor of the House bills and against the Senate bills.

I now yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I do not know how the discussion of the water-power bill arose. I came into the Chamber just at the time I interrupted the Senator in the discussion. I had read the article which the Senator refers to, where the President said this bill twice passed the House. A bill on the subject of water-power development did pass the House in the Congress before the last. In the last Congress Senate bill 3331 passed the Senate before any legislation had been enacted in the House. When it went to the House the bill introduced by Representative ADAMSON was substituted by the committee for it, and with very material, and I may say very hurtful, and I believe unconstitutional, amendments passed the House and went to conference. We have had several conferences upon the subject, some at my own instance and some at his request. The President never at any time to me condemned either of these bills. He was exceedingly anxious that some legislation upon this subject should be enacted that the water powers of the country could be developed, and that the two Houses should get together upon the subject. The last conversation, I believe the one that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] spoke of, occurred here in the President's room.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, I am going to read what the Senator from Alabama said.

Mr. SHIELDS. Please let me finish my statement.

Mr. NORRIS. All right, if Senators do not charge me with taking too much time.

Mr. SHIELDS. I read the statement that has been read into the RECORD, but the President does not express any preference for the House bill there.

Mr. NORRIS. I am going to read it.

Mr. SHIELDS. He does not there state that it was that bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Let us read it and see what it means.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will be glad to have the Senator read what the Senator from Alabama read.

Mr. NORRIS. I have the floor. Does the Senator think that when I read it he is going to go on and make his remarks?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not wish to take the Senator from the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. I hope not.

Mr. SHIELDS. But I know the evidence that it was——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators must address the Chair.

Mr. NORRIS. I have expressed a hope for a good while that I might get an opportunity to read this. The bill pertaining to the public lands was passed by the House and is known as the Ferris bill. Mr. FERRIS was chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands of the House of Representatives. It came over here. It went to the Public Lands Committee, of which the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] is the chairman. The committee reported it back here with a substitute striking out all the Ferris bill, everything in it after the enacting clause, and putting in a new bill. It was known here as the Myers bill. So the Senate bill was the Myers bill and the House bill was the Ferris bill. The other Senate bill which applied to navigable streams was known as the Shields bill. It bears the name of the honorable Senator from Tennessee. Just remember those facts.

Now here was the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], on January 19, 1917, rising to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. On what page of the RECORD?

Mr. NORRIS. I am reading from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 19, 1917, page 1662, the left hand column. I will read enough of it from the beginning so that the Senate will understand it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The Senator from Alabama had had this article read. I did not take up the time of the Senate to read it. It is probably not necessary. If anybody wants to have it read I will be glad to read it, but I do not want to take up unnecessary time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What article was it?

Mr. NORRIS. It was an article printed in a Washington paper. I will read some of it:

Last night the President called in Congressmen FERRIS, RAINEY, SHERLEY, and KENT, and told them he is favorable to the House action on water-power questions.

I am reading from the newspaper article now:

The Myers bill is pending before the Senate as the unfinished business. It was forced to the front by Democratic caucus action. Now that the President has made known his opposition it is uncertain what will be done with it. Efforts will be made to sidetrack it.

The Myers bill, remember, is a Senate bill substituted for the Ferris bill.

The Myers bill relates to water power on the public domain. The Shields bill is the general dam bill, and it has long been in conference.

I might add that the Shields bill applies to navigable streams. That is the other Senate bill.

Conservationists have attacked the Myers and Shields bills as bad, and the announcement of the President pleased them greatly to-day.
Neither Senator SHIELDS nor Senator BANKHEAD would admit that the President was opposed to the Shields bill or to the Myers bill. At the conference last night, however, the President is said to have taken a decided stand against them.

That is the end of the newspaper article.

Now, Mr. President, I will not comment on that language.

Mr. SHIELDS. May I ask the Senator just one question?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator has been a Member of the House and has often there participated in conferences, and he can answer the question readily. The Senator knows more about it than I do. The Senate bill was first passed by this body. It was Senate bill 3331. As the Senator said, it was known somewhat as the Shields bill. When that bill went to the House the House bill was substituted for it, but it did not change its number, it continued to be Senate bill 3331, and went into the conference as such and was known as the Shields bill, although it was largely amended. Now, is not that true?

Mr. NORRIS. That is true.

Mr. SHIELDS. Then the President and the Senator from Alabama both spoke correctly of it as being in favor of the Shields bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. It might have been construed as meaning the bill as amended, but the Senator from Alabama did not mean to say the President was in favor of it as amended, because the President left those matters to be settled by the conference committee, but he did express himself strongly in favor of water-power legislation.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, let me take up that statement. The parliamentary statement is correct. I want to apply it to the other bill and see just where the Senator is coming out. The Senator from Alabama in this statement said:

But in that conference the President of the United States emphatically stated that he is in favor of the passage of both these power bills, the one known as the Shields and the other as the Myers bill.

As the Senator says, the name was the Shields bill because it was originally introduced here and had Mr. SHIELDS's name to it and followed it all through, and therefore the President might have meant that he was in favor of the Shields bill, although he might have been in favor of some amendments. Now, let us see if that will work out.

If the President spoke of the Shields bill in a general way and meant, as he probably meant, that he was in favor of the House substitute but called it the Shields bill because it was originally introduced here and had the name Shields attached to it, then how does this explanation work when we come to apply it to the Myers bill? The Senator from Alabama stated emphatically that the President said he was in favor of the passage of both these bills, the one known as the Shields bill and the other known as the Myers bill. The Myers bill passed the House first as the Ferris bill. It was the Ferris bill. If the Senator's explanation was sufficient he would have said the Ferris bill, because that was introduced in the House, it bore the House number, it passed the House, it came to the Senate, and it went to the committee. The Myers bill was substituted, but it still bore the House number; it was a House bill yet.

So if the Senator wants to make that explanation in regard to the Shields bill he runs right into the opposite when he applies his explanation to what the Senator from Alabama said about the Myers bill. The term used by the Senator from Alabama was that the President was in favor of the Myers bill and the Shields bill. They were both Senate bills, and in his statement he condemns the Senate because they have not passed both bills on that proposition, and says the House did. You can not draw any other conclusion than that he was in favor of the House bills, and I hope he was. I would be glad to know if he was. But, according to what was said on the floor of the Senate, he favored the Senate bills. I can draw no conclusion from all this except that House Members from conferences with the President were of the opinion that the President was behind them in their fight, and from what was said by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] I can reach no other conclusion than that the President was favorable to the Senate bills.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I just wish to direct the Senator's attention to the fact that while the President practically charges the Senate with preventing the passage of both these water-power bills, as a matter of fact the Shields water-power bill never came out of the conference committee. It never was brought into the Senate after it was sent to conference.

Mr. NORRIS. No; and there are other things he charged there; for instance, in regard to what was known as the Webb bill. That is a bill that amends, as I understand it, the Sherman antitrust law. I am not finding fault with the President because he favors that bill. When it is considered I may be favorable to it myself. I do not know enough about it to express an opinion because we have not considered it; we have not had it up in the Senate, and I am not to blame because we have not had it up. It is not my fault.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment. There was the other bill he mentioned in this statement, several other bills—for instance, the bill increasing the membership of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I think I would have opposed that bill, and when the time comes I will give my reason, but I have not had an opportunity to do it yet; it has not been seriously considered by the Senate; and I am not to blame, neither are any of the other Senators whom the President denounces before the country to blame for it; neither are any of them to blame for the vast amount of legislation that was piled up on the Senate in the last few days of the session. Was it done purposely? I do not know. Sometimes it looks to me as though it was, that all these things were forced down on us at once when it was physically impossible in the time that remained even to read the bills, and then say you must swallow this dose or you are a filibusterer or a traitor to your country.

Mr. President, if that makes a filibusterer, then I am one. If that is treason, then make the most of it. I am not apologizing in any sense or in any degree.

I yield now to the Senator from Oklahoma if he wishes to ask me a question or I will yield the floor.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator yields the floor——

Mr. NORRIS. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I have just come into the Chamber. I have been informed that a resolution is pending changing the rules of the Senate, which change would authorize the Senate to close debate on certain conditions stated in the resolution. I ask the Chair if that is the question before us?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is the resolution offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] providing a rule by which 16 Senators may produce a closing of debate by limiting the time for debate. Does the Senator request that the rule be read?

Mr. STONE. I do not. I think I understand what the rule is. I supposed from what I have been told that that was the matter before the Senate.

I wish to say, Mr. President, that I am in entire sympathy with and heartily for the adoption of a cloture rule. The proposed rule is not in the form I would have written it if I could have written it. It is perhaps not in the form in which other Senators would have written it if they could have written it. But it does authorize the Senate to bring discussion to a close whenever two-thirds of the Senate voting so conclude. That is better than nothing.

I doubt, Mr. President, whether this proposed rule, if adopted, will be as effective as such a rule should be. It will serve the purpose of a cloture in cases where two-thirds desire to close debate; but where the Senate is divided, as it is now divided, on political lines, I do not believe the Senate will often be in a position to secure legislation with very much more facility than under the present rules. There were numerous bills pending at adjournment before the Senate of great importance. They will be before us again. I would have been glad if the rule could have been made so that instead of requiring a vote of two-thirds to close debate, debate could have been closed by a vote of a majority of the Senate.

I have stood for that policy for some years past and have labored in conjunction with others to establish it. But, of course, I am fully aware that to adopt any rude of cloture it must practically be done by unanimous consent, for the present rules would operate upon the consideration of a rule to establish cloture, and debate might go on indefinitely.

I shall vote for the rule as presented, although I can not escape the conviction that except for the particular purpose perhaps for which the rule is now presented—that is to say, for the passage of the so-called armed-neutrality bill—it will prove to be quite ineffective in the future. Nevertheless I am for it, even though it may be used to bring about the passage of a bill with which I am not in sympathy. I do not ask that the rules of the Senate shall be made to accommodate my individual purposes.

We ought to have a rule in the Senate that would enable the Senate to do business at any time with respect to any important pending legislation. Under the rule which is proposed, can you pass any of the bills referred to by the President in the statement he gave to the press criticizing the rules and procedure of the Senate, which he said was responsible for the defeat of the armed-neutrality bill? In that statement the President called attention to a number of pending bills of great importance to the country, the consideration of which had been defeated by the misuse of the Senate rules. Can you get a two-thirds vote in the Senate and close debate upon any of those bills?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think we can on any one of them.

Mr. STONE. I hope the Senator from Georgia is correct. I hope so, but I do not believe it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr STONE. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], speaking sotto voce, expresses a different opinion. I do not know.

Mr. THOMAS. And a decidedly different opinion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators must address the Chair.

Mr. STONE. I do not know.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. SMITH of Georgia addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. STONE. I will yield first to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator this question. Is it not true that in the water-power bills less than a third of the Senators consumed all the time that was taken upon them and more than two-thirds of the Senators wanted to stop debate and would have brought the matter to a close if we had had a rule like this?

Mr. STONE. The Senator asks a question and asserts what he says is a fact.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I meant it all as a question.

Mr. STONE. I can not speak as to the fact. I do not know. I know, as far as I am personally concerned, I favored closing that debate and would have voted for it. The other water-power bill under the management of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] would have been acted upon by the Senate if I could have had it done; and so with the other bills referred to by the President.

But, Mr. President, I could not have my way. While I know what I would do and understand my own feelings, I do not know what the ideas or feelings of my colleagues on either side might be. I fear, sir, that the happy hope expressed by the Senator from Georgia will not be realized when we take up some of these important measures to which I have adverted.

Nevertheless, Mr. President, I shall vote for this rule, but not with much confidence as to its efficacy. It is at least a step in the right direction, and it will do some good and can do no harm.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. STONE. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. Does not the Senator know that, under the present rules of the Senate, we could have obtained a vote upon the Myers water-power bill, but that the reason why the bill was not pressed was that those who were in favor of it felt that there were votes enough in the Senate to defeat it? It would have been impossible, Mr. President, to have talked the bill to death when it was reported to the Senate and was up for consideration.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I do not know about that. I heard Senators say on the floor—I can not name them now, although the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] authorizes me to name him as one—that they would exhaust every resource in their hands to prevent the passage of the bill.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. STONE. And yet the Senator from Utah at this moment is filled with the belief that that bill could have been enacted into law under the present rules. I feel sure he is mistaken.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there were only two Senators who made any extended remarks upon that bill. The bill was put aside for everything else, and ultimately it was decided not to present it to the Senate at all.

Mr. STONE. I am familiar with that. I know everything was put aside for it. I also know that we went on here considering the bill as the unfinished business for days and days, and as one Senator I was anxious to have it disposed of, as both the Senators from Montana know, if they remember my assurances; but, sir, the bill was talked and talked about for days and days. I do not know whether there were 2 or 20 speeches, but Senators were talking about it in an endless sort of way. Whether the speeches were long or short is immaterial; Senators were talking and talking about the bill, until the Senate concluded that we could not pass it, and it was laid aside. Here was the Senator from Colorado, and there were others ready at any moment to take the floor and to present their views at any length—ad infinitum—with a determined effort to prevent the passage of the bill.

Mr. President, I think we shall find ourselves exactly in that condition under this proposed rule; but we can not get any other rule. I assume that the Senator from Georgia would have been glad to have made a better rule if he thought he could have gotten it through.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think this is a splendid rule, sir. I would not vote for a majority cloture.

Mr. STONE. Well, I should be very glad to vote for that; but I do not believe we would be able to pass—at least, I fear we would not be able to pass—a majority cloture through the Senate. If we could get it to a vote, however, we could pass it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I doubt that.

Mr. STONE. Well, I believe we could pass it if Senators would consent to vote to substitute majority rule for a two-thirds majority. I think there are votes enough here to pass the majority cloture rule.

Mr. OVERMAN. We have got unanimous consent to consider this resolution. Suppose the Senator offers his proposition.

Mr. STONE. Unanimous consent to offer that?

Mr. OVERMAN. I say we have unanimous consent for the consideration of the pending measure.

Mr. STONE. Yes; we have unanimous consent to consider the pending rule; but I do not propose to offer an amendment to strike out the words "two-thirds" and to insert the words "a majority," if it would lead, as I believe it would, to a long discussion, I am not so anxious as all that to develop the attitude of the Senate. I think I know the attitude of the Senate already without developing it. It has been developed often enough in my experience here for me to have an accurate idea of it.

I shall vote for the rule reported by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. I intend to vote for it, although I repeat that I think it will have but little beneficial effect except in a few rare and very exceptional instances; but for Heaven's sake let us apply it even in those few instances.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, it is my intention to support this resolution which has been brought in by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. My colleagues in their conference have by a practically unanimous vote—I believe it was unanimous—given their support to this particular motion providing for a modified cloture.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. OWEN. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. I dislike to interrupt the Senator from Oklahoma, but I desire to say that the vote was not unanimous.

Mr. OWEN. I beg the Senator's pardon, I thought that it was. The vote cast in the conference was on the basis, on the part of the overwhelming majority of the conference, I am sure, that it was the best we could do without engendering a prolonged filibuster against a change of the rules.

Mr. President, in giving support to this modified cloture, by which two-thirds may close debate, subject to one hour each to Senators thereafter on the pending measure and the amendments thereto, I desire to say that I, at this time, agree to the two-thirds vote with reluctance, and because I believe a national exigency requires that the Senate may, to some extent at least, be able to terminate debate; but, Mr. President, I would be unjust to myself and to my colleagues who agree with me on this side—and I think they are at least 40 in number—if I did not say that a majority has the right to close debate in this body when they see fit.

Mr. President, the theory that the Senate is a continuing body, that the Senate rules are a continuing set of rules, in my opinion, is not justified. I shall not repeat the argument which the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] made on yesterday with regard to this body not being a continuous body, but I do submit that, whether the body be continuous or not, the rules of the Senate are not continuous even during a session of the body itself, except subject to the will of the Senate itself. The Senate may, indeed, adopt rules which will permit a filibuster, which will permit a minority to rule the majority; the Senate may adopt a rule of that kind by a majority vote of the Senate; and if it does so it is within its constitutional rights, unless those rules be found to deprive the Senate of the United States of its constitutional function to legislate. If those rules do that, they are void; they are violative of the spirit and principle of the Constitution; and, in my judgment, Senators, bound on their oaths to observe the Constitution of the United States, can not maintain rules that do deprive the Senate of its constitutional right of government.

Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senate—I am only going to take a few minutes, not over 10 minutes——

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma permit a suggestion?

Mr. OWEN. I will.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator is opening up a very wide range of discussion which will have to come up in the Senate for debate later on, and I earnestly hope that he will permit us to get at this pending resolution and to pass it.

Mr. OWEN. In just two minutes. I shall not take perhaps over a minute. I merely want to call the attention of the Senate to the Constitution of the United States, which says:

> Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a Member.

That is the Constitution of the United States. It does not need any illustration or explanation; it speaks for itself. I yield the floor.

Mr. PENROSE and Mr. CUMMINS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania first addressed the Chair.

Mr. PENROSE. Do I understand the Senator from Oklahoma has concluded?

Mr. OWEN. I have yielded the floor.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I do not intend to offer an amendment to the pending resolution; I expect to vote for it; but I want to address an inquiry to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] so that I may ascertain whether his view of the construction and interpretation of the resolution agrees with mine. The resolution provides a method of cloture for closing debate, and provides that the pending bill shall be the unfinished business of the Senate to the exclusion of all other business until disposed of. I take it that that does not mean that the Senate shall be held in continuous session until the bill is disposed of, but that certain motions provided for in Rule

XXII, so long as that rule may be in force, shall be applicable. I refer particularly to the following motions:

To adjourn;
To adjourn to a day certain, or that when the Senate adjourn it shall be to a day certain;
To take a recess; and
To commit.

I take it these motions would be applicable to the unfinished business under this rule. Am I correct?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Undoubtedly, the motions mentioned would be. The resolution reads:

Said measure shall be the unfinished business to the exclusion of all other business until disposed of.

Of course, a motion to take a recess or a motion to adjourn would be in order. A motion to recommit also would be in order. Any motion which disposes of the measure would be in order.

Mr. PENROSE. A motion to postpone indefinitely would be in order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That would finally dispose of the measure.

Mr. PENROSE. But motions to amend and to postpone to a day certain, of course, would not be in order?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They would not be in order.

Mr. PENROSE. Then, I take it, Mr. President, that it would be in order to move to adjourn, to move to adjourn to a day certain, to take a recess, to lay on the table, to postpone indefinitely, and to commit.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think a motion to lay on the table would be in order. Under our rules that does not dispose of the measure.

Mr. PENROSE. That is true.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is subject to be recalled from the table.

Mr. PENROSE. And it would restrict debate, which is permitted under the rule.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. PENROSE. But the other motions would be in order?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The others would be in order. In the rule originally drafted—and this is practically the rule that the Rules Committee reported last summer, and which a number of Senators agreed two or three weeks ago they would seek to take up and dispose of at this time—in the former rule we had a provision that allowed motions to recess and to adjourn; but in that resolution the language used was not that the measure should become the unfinished business. Having become, under the rule now proposed, the unfinished business, a motion to adjourn or for a recess is a necessary consequence in the handling of the unfinished business, and we did not deem it necessary to put that proviso into this rule. Beyond question, a motion to recess and a motion to adjourn would be in order.

Mr. PENROSE. Or to commit?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Or to recommit.

Mr. PENROSE. That is my understanding; and, as I view it, that was the understanding of the Senators who met in conference on this resolution. The words "to recess or to adjourn," which were in the resolution reported out unanimously last May by the Committee on Rules were not retained in the resolution that is now pending before the Senate because, in the opinion of every Senator present at the conference, they were not necessary, it being, in their opinion, obvious that a motion to adjourn, a motion to recess, or a motion to commit was applicable to the unfinished business as such without mention in the resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The change in the language, if the Senator will permit me, is this: The language in the original resolution was:

Then said measure shall be in order to the exclusion of all other business except a motion to recess or to adjourn.

Now, in this resolution we say:

Then said measure shall be the unfinished business to the exclusion of all other business until disposed of.

Being the unfinished business, it is subject, as all unfinished business pending before the Senate is, to a motion to recess or to a motion to adjourn; but it must be kept the unfinished business until it is disposed of.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, perhaps the inquiry has been hardly necessary on my part; but I thought in a matter of this magnitude it would be well to have a memorandum in the RECORD that the understanding of the 10 Senators who discussed and framed this resolution was that the motions I have indicated would be in order.

Mr. CUMMINS and Mr. THOMAS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa first addressed the Chair, and is recognized. Does he yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Colorado, if he so desires.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I desire to say a very few words at this time, and I am obliged to the Senator from Iowa for yielding to me for that purpose.

The discussion just ended regarding the Myers water-power bill requires, I think, a short statement from myself, as I was an humbly conspicuous opponent of the bill. My position regarding it was openly announced when the bill was reported and correctly stated by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], but the assertion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], that a vote could have been secured without a filibuster during the closing days of the session is equally true, for the reason that we polled the Senate and discovered a majority against its passage. Therefore, those of us who otherwise would have opposed its submission to a vote—perhaps my statement is too broad; my opposition to its submission to a vote disappeared with the knowledge of that fact.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. STONE. To be sure, if the Senator canvassed the Senate and found that there was a majority upon his side he would be willing to vote; but if the other side by some accident happened to get possession of that knowledge, what would they have had to say or do?

Mr. THOMAS. Why, Mr. President, open confession is good for the soul; I should have continued my opposition, as the rules permitted.

Now, Mr. President, a word as to this proposed rule, which I shall discuss more fully at some other time, I have no disposition to postpone a vote upon it, for it is slated to pass. Mr. President, the wisdom of many is greater than the wisdom of one, but were the opposite the fact, I should still feel constrained at a time like this to defer my individual opinions to those of the majority of my associates and with whom I politically affiliate. For that reason, and for that reason only, I shall vote for the rule. But, Mr. President, my own convictions are that inasmuch as the principle of majority rule is an established and essential principle in American Government, from the Nation to its smallest hamlet, and inasmuch as the majority is responsible for all governmental activity, they and they alone should have and exercise the power of determining what its policy will be not only with regard to legislation but as well the methods by which legislation is to be accomplished.

Some years ago the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] was an earnest and persuasive advocate of that doctrine. In 1893 he contributed two or three articles to the magazines upon the subject of cloture, at a time when the country was undergoing the ordeal of a filibuster against the repeal of the purchasing clause of what was popularly known as the Sherman Silver Act. In November, 1893, in a contribution to the North American Review, the Senator said:

No minority is ever to blame for obstruction. If the rules permit them to obstruct, they are lawfully entitled to use those rules in order to stop a measure which they deem injurious. The blame for obstruction rests with the majority, and if there is obstruction it is because the majority permit it. * * * They and they alone can secure action and initiate proceedings to bring the body whose machinery they control to a vote.

In that same article the Senator from Massachusetts further said:

No extreme or violent change is needed in order to remedy the existing condition of affairs. A simple rule giving the majority power to fix a time for taking a vote upon any measure which has been before the Senate and under discussion, say, for 30 days would be all sufficient. Such a change should be made and such a rule passed, for the majority ought to have and must have full power and responsibility.

In those sentences, Mr. President, the distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts sums up the entire philosophy of the subject.

Now we have presented to us, because of the developments in the last few days, which may never recur, and the aroused public opinion upon the subject, a rare opportunity to amend the rules and establish cloture by majority. If we are to let it pass by the enactment of this rule, which will bring no real measure of relief, we shall regret it very soon. This rule, requiring a two-thirds vote for its recognition, can not be obtained in most instances, perhaps in very few. When obtained, it fixes no time when a vote can be taken, but leaves full opportunity to the minority to postpone a vote to the consideration of endless motions to adjourn and to calls for quorums and to appeals from the rulings of the Chair, which may prove quite as efficacious to obstruction as the longest addresses can be. We are therefore giving a promise to the ear of the country which will be broken to the hope. We have agreed to, and are about to enact at this crisis, something that we call cloture, which, in its practical operation, will prove a delusion and a snare; in other words, this golden opportunity is to be lost, and we are about to enact a proposed limitation upon debate to relieve this body from the burden of future filibustering, which leaves many opportunities for its continuation. The fact is that a majority do not want cloture. They will not surrender the power which its absence gives to the individual. My impression is that, unless the rules be amended by providing cloture by majority, the practical operation of this measure will prove a deep disappointment to the hopes of those who are sponsors for it. I trust I may be mistaken. I have the most abundant confidence in the wisdom and judgment of the Senators who disagree with me upon this subject. I earnestly trust that theirs may in time prove to be the correct estimate of what this measure will accomplish, but I doubt it. I therefore vote for it under protest.

Mr. CUMMINS, Mr. HARDWICK, and Mr. MYERS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to express an opinion about the resolution now before the Senate without being burnt in effigy, which seems to appeal strongly to at least one Senator present, or without being classified as a "filibusterer," I desire to do so.

I am very earnestly for the resolution. I am not for it, however, on account of the unparalleled and unprecedented outburst which recently emanated from the White House. I am not for it on account of the lying representations that have been spread about through the country in the newspapers. I am for it because I believe that the Senate—and, I was about to say, a majority of the Senate—should be permitted to do business. Three times since I became a member of this body have I introduced a resolution establishing cloture in the Senate, each one of them more rigid than the one now before us. Ten months and a half ago, when the resolution of the Senator from Georgia was before the Committee on Rules, I voted, in common with every other member of that committee, in favor of reporting it favorably. That resolution is, in substance, the resolution now before the Senate. I was for it because, very much as suggested by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], I felt that nothing more effective could be secured. If I could present a cloture that would satisfy my own judgment it would be one in which less than two-thirds could adopt the rule, but a longer time than one hour would be preserved to each Senator for debate after the rule is in force.

I have said so much, Mr. President, because I did not want it to be understood here or anywhere else that I am a recent convert to the proposition that the Senate should be able to control itself, or that I am in the least dismayed by the storm which the President's censure has aroused.

I refer to that for a moment, and only a moment, to the end that the RECORD may show at least how unfounded, how utterly baseless, is the charge or suggestion of filibustering so far as I am concerned, and so far as I know with any other Member of the body. I am speaking now of the bill which expired with the death of Congress at noon on the 4th day of March—the bill which will be known in the future as the bill empowering the President of the United States to declare and make war at his own pleasure.

That bill came into the Senate upon the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] on the morning of Friday, March 2. At 4 o'clock and 30 minutes on the afternoon of Friday the Senate proceeded to its consideration, having in the meanwhile laid it aside in order that the unanimous-consent agreement respecting the naval bill could be executed. At 4.30 in the afternoon of Friday, March 2, the Senate took up for consideration the bill to which I have referred. At that time there were 43½ hours before Congress would expire by constitutional limitation. There were 43½ hours, even though the Senate should sit continuously, in which to consider the bill, which I regard as the most important bill that has been proposed in a half century. The Senate did not sit continuously, however, because at 1 o'clock on Saturday morning, upon the motion of the Senator in charge of the bill, it took a recess until 10 o'clock. We therefore had a little less than 35 hours in which to consider this bill. Mark, now: Of the 35 hours of the Senate's session which intervened between the moment at which the Senate took up the bill for consideration and the expiration of Congress the Senators who have been termed, by way of reproach, "a little group of willful men," consumed less than 11 hours in debate. Those who do not suffer the reproach which it is thought has been cast upon some of us consumed more than 24 hours of time in some kind of debate.

I do not assert that the 24 or 25 hours to which I have alluded were consumed in debate by those who were in favor of the bill, but the time was either so consumed or the Senator in charge of the bill permitted it to be laid aside for other business which he thought imperative; and I am not criticizing him for doing it. Of the 11 hours so consumed by the "little group of willful men" the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]—I am not sure whether I ought to classify him as one of that group, but it seems to me that the situation will permit me to do so—consumed four hours and a little more, and he consumed it in the delivery of one of the most convincing and profound arguments I have ever heard upon the floor of the Senate; and all the remainder of this so-called group consumed less than seven hours in debate upon the measure.

So far as I am concerned, I simply reiterate my position toward the bill. I was opposed to the bill as it was reported by the Senate committee. The moment it came before the Senate I presented an amendment to it which would have permitted merchant vessels to arm themselves for defense against unlawful attack, and which would have authorized the President to supply these vessels with arms and ammunition for defense against unlawful attack, subject to just one condition; namely, that a vessel so supplied from a Government arsenal should not carry arms and munitions of war to a belligerent. I was opposed to the latter part of the measure which attempted to confer upon the President unlimited, unrestricted power to use any instrumentality or any method which might seem to him wise in carrying out his purposes; but all that I desired was an opportunity to offer my amendment and to submit to the Senate the observations which seemed to me to be pertinent to my amendment. That opportunity did not come to me until 10 o'clock Saturday night, although I rose and addressed the Chair a half-dozen times before that hour. I am not criticizing the Chair at all, because there were others who were eager to speak, most of whom were in favor of the bill, and I am sure that the Chair was entirely impartial in his recognition of Senators. I am quite willing so to feel and so to publicly declare.

I debated the amendment which I had presented for a little more than one hour, and then my part in this drama—this tragedy, as it would have been—ceased; and any man, in the Senate or out of it, whether he is of high degree or low degree, who intimates that I attempted or conspired unfairly to prevent a vote upon this bill, deliberately falsifies. I wish I could use a stronger term and be within the rules of the Senate.

Mark you, I would not have voted for the bill unless either the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri or my amendment had been adopted, or some equivalent change in the measure had been made. There was no man in this Senate so anxious for any one thing as I was to secure a vote upon the amendment which I had proposed. If it had been rejected I might have been constrained to vote against the measure, for I regarded it as unwise, unconstitutional, and unpatriotic. But before those who had a right to speak upon it—who had just as unquestioned, absolute right to speak upon it as any Senator who had spoken theretofore—could be given an opportunity to express their views, and express them in a fair and reasonable way, without unduly prolonging the discussion, the session of Congress came to an end.

It is obvious, of course—everybody knows—that the rule we are about to adopt and for which I will very gladly vote and for which I have labored these eight years and more that I have been in the Senate, would not have secured a vote, if it had been in force, upon the bill to empower the President to declare war and thereafter make war. The time provided for between the filing of the motion signed by 16 Senators and the submission of the motion to the Senate, if there had not been one word of debate, would have precluded the operation of the rule, for before that time would have come Congress would have expired.

Mr. President, I apologize to the Senate, not for what I did or said upon a former occasion but for consuming the time I have now consumed in speaking upon a resolution the passage of which I so much desire.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I do not propose to detain the Senate for more than a very few minutes; but I feel that there are certain views about this matter that ought to be expressed, especially in view of the speech made on yesterday by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Without undertaking to answer with as great detail as the Senator from Montana asserted his propositions, I wish to controvert them, practically every one, and to announce to the Senate and to the country my utter, complete, and entire dissent from the propositions announced by that Senator and the conclusions reached by him.

Mr. President, I have no doubt in my own mind—and I believe I have given the subject as much attention, as much thought, and possibly as much study, as the Senator from Montana—that the Senate is a continuing body. The framers of our Federal Constitution so intended. No man can read with care or thought the debates of the convention which framed it and reach any different conclusion. It was provided that two-thirds of the Senate should always be in office, the entire number of the Senate being recruited every two years by the addition of one-third new Members; so that always two-thirds of the Senate—a great deal more than a quorum—hold office continuously, and the Senate itself continues an unending, eternal existence.

Mr. President, in support of this opinion I could cite, if I felt authorized to consume the necessary time, not only the views and statements of the gentlemen who framed the Constitution under which we live, or many of them, but the most eminent authorities in this Republic, both Democratic and Republican. I will refer very briefly to one of these gentlemen.

James Buchanan, long distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, President of these United States, said this many years ago:

> Senators had contended that one Senate or one Congress had no right to elect officers for their successors; and that, therefore, the joint resolution violated the Constitution, because it gave the election of a Printer for the next Senate to that which had expired on the 3d of March. This was as strange a position as any which had been assumed throughout the argument. An old Senate and a new Senate.
> There could be no new Senate. This was the very same body, constitutionally and in point of law, which had assembled on the first day of its meeting in 1789. It has existed without any intermission from that day until the present moment, and would continue to exist as long as the Government should endure. It was emphatically a permanent body. Its rules were permanent and were not adopted from Congress to Congress like those of the House of Representatives. For many years after the commencement of the Government its Secretary was a permanent officer, though our rules now require that he should be elected at stated intervals. The Senate always had a President, and there were always two-thirds of its actual members in existence, and generally a much greater number. It would be useless to labor this question. Every writer, without exception, who had treated on the subject had declared the Senate to be a permanent body. It never dies; and it was the sheet anchor of the Constitution on account of its permanency. Senators were thus deprived of the poor apology that one Senate had no right to bind its successors.

Mr. President, of course no one ever asserted that the Senate could not at any time change its officers or modify its rules, whenever a majority of its Members saw fit to do so.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator, if he had time to read it, might also cite what the great Delaware Senator said on the same subject. The question was asked here, "Is the Supreme Court of the United States, formed at the same time with the Senate, a continuing body?" A very significant question; and he then proceeded to argue, founded upon that, that the Senate was a continuing body.

Mr. HARDWICK. Not only that, but I might add that in language equally striking Benjamin Harrison, President of the United States, long a distinguished Member of this body, voiced exactly the same sentiments.

Mr. OVERMAN. I read that into the RECORD yesterday.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am glad the Senator read that into the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator may well add, too, that if anyone will take time to look up the debates in the Senate, whenever the question has been referred to, even incidentally, almost every Senator on both sides of the Chamber has admitted that the Senate was a continuing body.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; and until the advent into this body of the distinguished and able Senator from Montana, no Senator of any great rank as a lawyer ever made such a contention as he has made.

I am not going to waste the time of the Senate by referring at length to these authorities, but it is just as President Buchanan said. No writer who has studied the Constitution, or understands its philosophy, has ever stated this proposition differently. Of course the Senate may at any time change any one or all of its rules; the Senate may at any time displace any one or all of its officers; but the Senate itself was intended by the makers of our Constitution to be a permanent body, and provision was made that two-thirds of its membership should always be in office.

Mr. President, my conviction on this subject is not only profound, but my belief in the accuracy of the views I have stated to the Senate is so strong that I do not think it necessary to continue the discussion of this question, even if the Senator from Montana did take several hours to present a different opinion. I wish, however, very briefly, to address myself to the question presented by the resolution offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN].

I think my associates in this body on both sides of this Chamber understand full well that I am not very enthusiastic over establishing anything like what is called cloture in this body or on this floor. I have been through considerable experience in another body where they do have cloture; and adopting the language, I think, of a distinguished gentleman who once sat in this body, I will say to the Senate, If it is true that the Senate debates without legislating, it is equally true that the House of Representatives legislates without debating; and if we have all action in one body and no debate, and all debate in another body without any action, it seems to me that we ought not to rush from the extreme that we complain of in this body to the extreme that is established at the other end of this Capitol.

Will we gain anything by putting it in the power of a bare majority of the Senate to shut off debate on the instant, to close the mouths and hush the voices of the representatives of sovereign States on this floor? Will the American Government be stronger if such a course be adopted? I think not. I submit not.

This is a Government of checks and balances, and wisely so—so established, so constructed by our fathers; and, for one, I have not progressed far enough away from their ideas to believe that they wrought poorly, or that we can much improve on them, in the fundamentals, at least. I lay down the proposition before this Senate and before the country that to-day the last citadel of opposition to the Executive will and to the establishment of the Executive as an autocratic authority in this country, clothed with despotic powers, is here in this Chamber and on this floor; and I say to the Senate and to the country: If you chain this Senate, if you bind it, if you put it in the power of a partisan majority at any instant, at any moment, or on any question, to run roughshod over the minority for the time being, and deny to Senators the right to speak on this floor, and deny real debate in this Chamber, you will have destroyed one of the most valuable checks and balances in our Government, and you will have made a long step toward the possible establishment of an autocratic and despotic power in this country.

Mr. President, there is another reason why the Senate of the United States ought to be slow, indeed, about the adoption of any very radical or any very real cloture, and it is this: This is likewise the one piece of governmental machinery in the American system where "Pause" can be said to the majority, where whatever party is in power can be halted temporarily at least, until in a way—unofficially, of course, and informally—the sense of the public may be taken on any pending question. If the proposition advocated by some Senators is adopted here, and cloture on the majority vote is established in this body, it may be easier for us, my colleagues, on this side, in disposing of party measures; it may be more convenient for us as individuals; it may seem temporarily that as Democrats we will gain some advantage, but I do believe that as Americans we will lose. We may not always be in power. In years past we have been in power but very little; and for years while I was a Member of another body at the other end of this building I saw Democratic minority Senators use these rules to assert the rights of the minority and to hold down a rampant majority in both Houses; and I tell you right now, it is one of the great barriers, one of the great checks, under our American system.

Why, majorities are not always right. No, Senators; not at all. We all know that. I have seen many instances in which minorities were right, and even the men who constituted the majority lived to admit it. Now, if that is true, we might just as well be a little careful about entirely stifling a minority, about denying it all voice, about denying it all opportunity to say "Halt" and "Pause" to a partisan majority.

Mr. President, so much for that. I am coming down now to this proposition. I support this resolution reluctantly—reluctantly for one reason alone. I can not help but feel reluctant to go even this far with you, Senators, when Senators are openly asserting that this is but the entering wedge; when Senators are telling me, even are saying in my presence, that this is merely the beginning of the end. I fear so, and yet I hope not. I hope that a careful consideration of this question will convince Senators who maintain even now that position that they ought not to insist upon it. I would not yield even this far except, Mr. President, that I do feel that on questions that affect our country's international affairs, when war is imminent, is threatened, or is actually occurring there must be some way in which the will of an overwhelming majority—a majority so large as to show that the interest of the country and not that of a party are at stake—can be asserted.

The Senator from Iowa said, and said very truly, that probably under this rule we might not have been able to pass the armed-neutrality bill. I think possibly we could have done it if the motion had been made when the matter was first presented. Certainly it could have been done if the proposition itself had been presented only a day or two earlier. Be that as it may, we, everyone, know that in the future on any question of this sort when two-thirds of the Senators, or a greater number even than two-thirds, stand together we will be able within a reasonable time to force a vote on any question in which the honor or the safety of the country is involved. For that reason, and for that reason alone, I am supporting this resolution.

Senators assert—some of them do on this side and a few on the other side—that they support this resolution reluctantly because it does not go far enough.

Mr. President, I support it reluctantly for a very different reason, for exactly the opposite reason, because I fear that it may go too far before many years be passed. My views on this question are so fixed and set that I thought it a matter of personal and official duty to utter my sentiments on this floor before the vote was taken.

Mr. President, I am about to yield the floor. I hope the resolution will pass. I intend to vote for it, and I am for it; but I hope the day may be far distant before any further step in this direction will ever be taken by this body.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] has stated so much better than I can the ideas which I have entertained on this subject that I shall not repeat them in detail. I think the Senate and the country, however, do not properly understand the real situation. It is not the fault of the rules that the Senate fails to act upon legislation in what is due and proper time. It is quite the habit of the Senate to delay work upon legislation until late in the session. It meets in December and shortly thereafter adjourns until after the holidays. It does not get down to effective work until the closing weeks of the session, at which period it is absolutely impossible for Senators to consider as they ought to consider the questions which are brought up under great congestion.

I have realized, however, for some time that there was to be a change in the rules. Illy informed public sentiment has seemed to demand it, and too many legislators are more busy listening to supposed public sentiment than they are in trying to properly inform that sentiment. I have been willing that Senators should speak as long as they wanted to speak upon the questions before the Senate, but unfortunately the great liberty which is accorded here in debate is sometimes abused. Some Senators occupy the time of the Senate evidently because they can occupy it; opportunity is given to get into the RECORD and to practice on long-distance talking, but nevertheless all the Senator from Georgia has stated is absolutely true. The perpetuity of the Republic depends, I firmly believe, upon unrestricted opportunity to deliberate on matters of legislation. Autocracy can be established and endure only when the people's representatives cease to deliberate and abandon all to the Executive.

I am going to vote for this proposed rule, because it is not, in terms, very radical, and because it may tend to correct some abuses in debate. I hope it will not lead to more dangerous changes. I regret the circumstances, however, under which it is brought to the Senate.

I submit, sir, that if some other question than one of international character, one that seems to appeal strongly to the country and to the Senators as of vital importance, had been under consideration and the Executive of this country had criticized the Senate as he did criticize it on last Monday, many Senators would be found here proposing that some action be taken by the Senate condemning the President for his unwarranted criticism of a coordinate branch of the Government. I regard it as most unfortunate and unbecoming a President to characterize the Senate and Senators as the President in his recent statement, as published in the press, did characterize them.

It could not have been done, sir, because the President felt that the legislation he desired had been permanently defeated, because he knew, as every Senator knew, that all he had to do was to call Congress together on the 5th of March to get consideration for the measure. No man can successfully dispute that proposition. To a great many Senators it seems that it is the business of Congress to be here in session ready to assist in the great emergency to which the President called attention and which we knew theretofore.

Mr. President, I suppose that at this time I would be criticized if I were to express my understanding of the President's motives in treating the Senate as he has treated it. There are many matters that come up and suggest themselves to me, as they do to you, other than the one of getting action upon this armed-neutrality bill which was before the Congress, which might have actuated the President; but, assuming that he was moved to anger by the failure of the Senate to vote his bill through, yet that did not warrant his unfortunate interference. I believe his criticism was unjust, undignified, and unwarranted, and contrary to the spirit of the Constitution.

Suppose the Senate as a Senate should give to the press a statement condemning the President because of the manner in which he performed his duties and imputing to him lack of loyalty to the Government and lack of patriotism to his country, would it be condoned as thoughtless action induced by disappointment? It would be wrong for the Senate to do that, but no more wrong and improper than what the President has done. At a time when there ought to be cooperation between all the departments of the Government for one department to use the methods that are sometimes employed by the ordinary disappointed ward politician strikes me as being most unfortunate.

I regretted that on Sunday we could not get a vote upon the armed-neutrality bill. I would have been glad if Senators could have surrendered their right to speak upon it, a right that had been exercised, however, by other Senators before them, and allowed a vote. But failure to vote did not mean the death of the legislation. It would have been postponed only a day or two if the President really wanted action. It was known at that time that appropriation bills calling for five hundred and odd million dollars were pending which must be passed between then and the 30th day of June. An extra session was inevitable. It should have been called for the 5th day of March. Congress could then have proceeded to the disposition of all the business before it.

It is not possible except at the end of a session to defeat a measure by filibuster. Every Senator concedes that. Therefore it is unjust criticism that has been heaped upon Congress and makes it contemptible before the country because it does not know the truth. The President has degraded one of the coordinate branches of the Government at a time when there should be harmony and strength. There was no partisanship displayed in the discussion last week. No party lines were drawn. The great majority of the Senate on both sides of the aisle were joining hands to do, not what all of them wanted to do, because many of them like myself wanted to see the bill amended and wanted an opportunity to amend it; but we were all working, hoping that we might pass the legislation, thus serving notice on the world that the Congress of the United States was back of the President, right or wrong. But this rule is now brought here because, it will be said, the President has demanded that the Senate proceed with its work according to his will. He says the country demands that the rules be amended.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. TOWNSEND. With pleasure.

Mr. HARDWICK. I wish to state to the Senator that my colleague reported from the Committee on Rules substantially this same proposition on the 16th day of May, 1916. So the country is wrong if it says that.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Absolutely so.

Mr. PENROSE. It was a unanimous report signed by Republicans and Democrats.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It was a unanimous report that I submitted.

Mr. TOWNSEND. And if the majority, that means both sides, were favorable to it, and had taken up that question at any time and insisted upon its passage it could have been passed. But there seemed no crying necessity for it at that time. If the empowering bill that was brought up had been a bill perchance which the majority of the Senate had favored but which the President opposed, and a minority had filibustered it to defeat, I imagine that the President would not have visited his disapproval upon the rules or upon that minority. Under such conditions the rules would have been what he said they were in his congressional government, viz, of great virtue.

Mr. McLEAN. Does not the Senator think we could show our faith by passing a resolution requesting the President to call a special session of the Congress, we will say, at a date not later than the 20th day of this month?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Undoubtedly, Mr. President; but I have not felt like encroaching upon the jurisdiction or the powers of the President. He knows and has known for some time that an extraordinary session was inevitable. It is possible that political reasons connected with the organization of the other House of Congress may have had something to do with the President's indisposition to call Congress together, but I do not care to speculate in that matter. I am now protesting against what I have felt was an unwarranted criticism of the Senate of the United States by the President. It was unfortunate, it was unjust, and I believe it was in violation of the spirit of the Constitution. Before he became President he could see that the liberties of the people rested in the fact that there would be one deliberative body in this country that could, without coercion of any kind, deliberate upon all measures affecting the welfare of the United States.

I am going to vote for the proposed rule because some amendment seems inevitable, and this is not a very radical change. If it had been a Senate rule last week, it would not have secured the passage of the armed-neutrality bill. I desire to say, however, to the new Senators, that the longer you are here, the more you become familiar with the rules and the possibilities for service to your States which those rules give to every Senator, whether he be humble or influential, the more you will hesitate to rob yourselves of those possibilities by placing all power in a majority, no matter to what party that majority belongs. The rules of the Senate afford absolute equality to all Senators; and if any Senator abuses his privileges under those rules, let him answer to his constituents; but under no circumstances should the Senate remove the last barrier against autocracy.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] said a while ago that the reason why the bill for the development of water power on the public domain was not pressed in the Senate any further than it was was the fact that the proponents of the bill had discovered that a majority of the Senate was against it, and that it could not pass this body. I can not let that statement go unchallenged. It is incorrect, at least as far as I am concerned.

That bill was made the unfinished business of the Senate last August, and it remained before the Senate four or five days, the greater part of each day. It was then displaced, against my vote and my opposition and against the vote and opposition of my colleague [Mr. WALSH], by the bill for an appropriation for a Government armor-plate plant, on the ground that that bill was more important to the country. The Senate adjourned in a very few days after the armor-plate bill had been disposed of, leaving no further chance for the water-power bill at that session. The water-power bill was made the unfinished business again in January this year, and remained before the Senate the greater part of several days, when it was displaced, in spite of my vote and my opposition and in spite of the vote and opposition of my colleague [Mr. WALSH], by an appropriation bill, under the general understanding that appropriation bills have the right of way. Not at any time after that was there a day when there was not some appropriation bill or a revenue bill or some other bill pressed in this body which had more power back of it than the water-power bill had. Those were the things that kept the water-power bill from coming again before the Senate.

I knew nothing about a majority of the Senate being against the bill. What the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has said has been supplemented by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], who says that the opponents of the bill had polled the Senate and learned that a majority of the Senate was against the water-power bill.

I accept the Senator's word, of course; and that being the case it must be because the majority of this Senate is opposed to any kind of legislation for the development of water power on the public domain, because it was in the power of the Senate to alter that bill, to modify it, to amend it, to put it in any shape that the majority of Senators might desire and prefer.

The bill was in the hands of the Senate, and if the bill as reported did not suit the Senate it could have changed it. I was not insistent, neither was my colleague [Mr. WALSH], on passing the bill in exactly the form in which it was reported, but I was willing to submit it to the Senate, and if it did not suit the Senate in that form to let the Senate consider it and adopt some other form.

So taking that statement to be correct it must have simply been because the majority of the Senate does not want any legislation of any character for the development of water power on the public lands.

These facts being stated, and I accept them all as true except that part which relates to my motives for not pressing the bill further, and in that the Senator from Utah is simply mistaken, but taking the other statements as true, if it is true that a majority of the Senate was against the bill, and that the opponents of the bill know that fact, then it is a new phase of legislation to me. That is a phase of legislation of which I never heard before; that is to say, that the majority of the members of a legislative body are against a bill and still will not allow it to come to a vote. If that is the case, then I think we ought to have an amendment to our rules to prevent a majority from filibustering against a measure, or, to put it in more pleasant language, to prevent a measure from coming to a vote. The idea that a majority is against a bill but will not let it come to a vote is something new in parliamentary practice. Yet that is what the opponents of the water-power bill would have us believe was the situation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana is mistaken when he attributes to me a statement that he had ceased to press the Myers water-power bill.

Mr. MYERS. I thought the Senator said the proponents of the bill, those who favored it, and I was one of them. He did not call me by name, of course.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly I did not call the Senator by name nor did I have reference to him. The water-power bill was before the Senate at the last session of Congress and was made the unfinished business——

Mr. MYERS. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will just let me finish this sentence, I will yield to the Senator for any question he may ask. At the beginning of the session in conformity with the action of the Democratic caucus the water-power bill was made the unfinished business, but it was laid aside time and time again. There were only two speeches of any length made upon it, and they were not made with a view of filibustering. The bill was made the unfinished business because of the action of the Democratic caucus, but I never thought for a moment that the majority of the Senate ever intended to force the bill to a vote. When I asked the question of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] whether the bill failed because of the fact that it was not pressed for action rather than on account of the rules of this body, I asked the question knowing full well that not one Senator on the other side of the Chamber, but a number of Senators, told me that the bill was never going to be voted on. There was no inclination to press it upon the other side of the Chamber, and future action on the part of the Senate demonstrated that I was correct in the position assumed in my question asked of the Senator from Missouri.

As far as I was concerned I never took five minutes of the time of the Senate in discussing the bill, and it was not discussed by any Senator after it was learned that there was a majority of the Senate opposed to it and that if it were brought to a vote it would be defeated. I was perfectly willing that the vote should be taken at any time, but I did make up my mind before I knew that fact that I could not allow the bill to pass if I could help it, because it meant so much to the Western States. There was a great principle involved in it. I do not believe that the people of the West yet want to become mere leasers of the public domain and I do not believe that they have arrived at a position where they want the Government of the United States to assume the position of a landlord.

The Senator knows that in most of the Western States three-fourths of the public land is at present tied up and the expenses of the States and all the institutions in the States must be and are supported by taxation upon about 20 per cent of the lands of those States.

So, Mr. President, I think I was well within the facts of the case when I stated that the reason why that bill was not forced to a conclusion was because there was little inclination on the part of the Senate to force it.

I want to say to the Senate now that the bill could have been forced to a vote under the rules of the body as they exist to-day.

I also want to say, Mr. President, that I believe under the rules of the Senate there would have been a vote upon the armed neutrality bill if the friends of the measure had not taken the time they did in discussing it. It is well known by all Senators that the friends of the measure occupied more time in discussing the bill than did those who were opposed to the bill.

I have taken a little time to examine the RECORD. The armed neutrality bill, so called, was reported to the Senate Friday morning. It was laid aside for the consideration of the naval appropriation bill. The Senate began the discussion of it at 4.30 o'clock Friday afternoon. I notice in the RECORD of March 2 there were 32 pages recording the Senate proceedings upon that day, and of the 32 pages there were but 21 pages showing a discussion of that bill. The balance of the RECORD of that day was filled with other matters and considered by the unanimous consent of this body. It also shows that the remarks of the friends of the bill cover nearly 20 pages of the RECORD, while the opponents of the measure had but 1½ pages of the RECORD on that day.

In the RECORD of March 3 there were 46 pages. The friends of the measure took 15½ pages, the opponents 12¼ pages.

The RECORD of March 4 contains 32 pages. The friends of the measure took 8 pages, the opponents 15 pages. In other words, the friends of the measure took 46½ pages of the RECORD and the opponents of the measure 28¾ pages, exclusive of the remarks made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE], and those remarks have not yet been printed. But estimating 12 pages for the speech delivered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] and 2 pages for the speech delivered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE], then there would be but 42¾ pages of the RECORD occupied by those who were in favor of the bill.

Mr. President, while the bill was being discussed there were the naval appropriation bill, the Agricultural appropriation bill, the conference reports made upon a number of bills presented and acted upon; there was the conference report on the Republic Coal Co. bill that upon two or three occasions was presented that led to discussion; there were petitions read, telegrams asked to be printed in the RECORD, and not satisfied with asking that they be printed in the RECORD Senators requested that they be read.

Mr. MYERS. May I make one remark there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUGHES in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. MYERS. The Republic Coal Co. joint resolution was but a very little time before the Senate, because I was very expeditiously taken off the floor every time I tried to get it up.

Mr. SMOOT. We took the Senator off the floor just as quickly as we could under the rules, I admit; but it all took time. I desire to say to the Senate now, that when the bill was taken up for consideration, even as late as 4.30 on Friday afternoon, under the rules of the Senate as they exist to-day, I have not the least doubt but that the bill could have been passed if its opponents had been the only Senators who desired to discuss it. I desire to say that much, Mr. President, in relation to this matter.

I am going to vote for the pending resolution. I was willing last May that a resolution similar to this and reported from the Committee on Rules should be considered; but let us remember that from May last up until March 4, at the close of the last session, there was no motion made by any Senator to take up the resolution, notwithstanding, as the Senator from Georgia has said, the report came to the Senate by a unanimous vote of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah, however, will recall that several times I spoke to him and other Senators with reference to taking up the resolution, and there was objection. I did not undertake to force the resolution by motion, because I hoped there would be an opportunity when we could dispose of it without coming in contact with other matters. In no sense does the Senator mean that I abandoned the resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. No; and I am very glad the Senator has made his statement.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I very cordially approved of the resolution, and I approve of the present one, because it is so much like the former one.

Mr. SMOOT. I am very glad the Senator from Georgia has called my attention to that matter, and I want to state here that the Senator was at all times ready to have the resolution taken up. As he stated, he spoke to me several times, asking whether the resolution could be brought up by unanimous consent.

Mr. OVERMAN. I also will say to the Senator from Utah that several times the resolution came up on the calendar when the Senator himself objected to it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on two occasions I objected to the consideration of the resolution, and I stated why I objected. It was not for myself, but for another Senator who had asked me in his absence to object to its consideration. I think I then stated to the Senator from Georgia that that was the reason.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Utah stated that he made the objection because he was under a promise to do so. He made that statement at least once to me, that some Senator on his side, who was absent, had asked him to make the objection to the resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; it was at a time when we had the calendar under consideration under Rule VIII, under which a Senator could only speak once upon a measure, and not to exceed five minutes. If the Senator from Georgia at any time had moved to take up the resolution, I would have very gladly voted to take it up.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The reason I did not make a formal motion to take up the resolution was that I feared considerable time would be consumed in its discussion, and I did not wish to inject it into the short session or into the time of the Senate, thinking it might take up quite a length of time in discussion and thereby prevent us from considering other matters which it was needful to pass. I had hoped to reach a period in the session when the resolution would pass with the consumption of but very little of the Senate's time.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there never has been a filibuster in the Senate of the United States which has been successful, unless there have been at least a third or more of the Members of this body in favor of the filibuster——

Mr. STONE. What about the river and harbor bill?

Mr. SMOOT. And further, unless it was conducted during the last few days of the short session of Congress. I do not intend now to go into a consideration of the mass of legislation which it was necessary to pass in the last few days of the recent short session of Congress. That has already been done; so I will only state that it was a physical impossibility for the mass of legislation to pass.

Mr. President, I have no doubt in my mind that if the President of the United States would call an extra session of Congress the armed-neutrality bill, so called, would pass within three days after it reached the Senate, if the Senator having the bill in charge would keep it before the Senate and the friends of the measure would not further discuss it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Was there not some understanding on the other side of the Chamber that the debate would be kept up in order to compel the President to call an extra session of Congress?

Mr. SMOOT. There was no such understanding of which I have knowledge.

Mr. OVERMAN. I saw that stated.

Mr. SMOOT. The newspapers so stated. It was stated that such a proposition was acted upon by the Republican conference; but there was no truth whatever in the statement.

Mr. OVERMAN. But there were some Senators on the other side who wanted an extra session so badly that they were willing to consume time to accomplish that purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. There were one or two Senators who said that they thought there ought to be an extra session of Congress, because they were of the opinion that Congress ought to be in session in case the emergency required a declaration of war. They took the ground that Congress had the power, and Congress only had the power, to declare war; but I desire to say that the Senators who took that position did not occupy one moment of time in the discussion of the bill for the arming of merchant ships.

Mr. President, I shall not take up any further time upon this resolution. I am ready to vote upon the resolution, and I have not the slightest doubt but that it will be passed by the Senate.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Virginia, having this resolution in charge. As I understand it, it is the intention of the Senator from Virginia to endeavor to hold the Senate here in session until the measure is disposed of?

Mr. MARTIN. It is my purpose to ask the Senate to remain in session until a final vote on the resolution is reached.

Mr. PENROSE. I entirely concur in the purpose of the Senator; my only desire in rising is to have the Senate a little better notified than it seems to be as to the intention of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. MARTIN. I am very glad to answer the inquiry. It is my purpose to ask—of course, it is for the Senate to determine—that the Senate remain in session until a final vote on the resolution is had.

Mr. PENROSE. A number of Senators have been under the impression that we should adjourn shortly, and I have informed them that the Senator's intention was otherwise. I thought it had better be publicly stated at this hour of the afternoon.

Mr. MARTIN. I am very glad, indeed, to state it.

Mr. MYERS and Mr. VARDAMAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana is recognized.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I will take but a moment, I will say to the Senator from Mississippi.

I know very well that the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] was unalterably opposed to the water-power bill and that a majority of the Senate were likewise opposed to it and would not let it come to a vote, while my colleague [Mr. WALSH] and I were earnestly desirous of securing a vote. So, I think it is the majority of the Senate against which we need protection, instead of against the minority.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I shall be very brief in what I have to say on the resolution now under consideration before the Senate. I desire a vote at the earliest possible moment consistent with the convenience and pleasure of Senators who desire to speak. I wish to say in the outset that there is no greater necessity for cloture in the Senate to-day than has existed for the last quarter of a century. Certainly not since I became a Member of this very honorable body. I am for this resolution not because of anything that has happened in the immediate past, nor because of anything that has been done or has been left undone by the last session of Congress. I am for it because I am of the opinion that there should be a rule limiting debate—a rule by which questions can be brought before the Senate for final determination whether it meets the approbation of all the Senators or not. I would have the fullest, freest, most exhaustive discussion of every question. To take any other view of the question would be at variance with the very purpose and spirit, the letter of the Constitution, and the fundamental principles underlying our system of government. Unlimited debate has served the people of the South on a former occasion in a way that would naturally cause one who is so partial as I am to that section of our common country to regard with reverence the custom of long standing which recognizes the right of unlimited debate in the Senate.

It is said that under the privileges allowed a Senator in the matter of debate, determination, great mental ability, and limitless physical endurance enabled the Senators from the South on one occasion to defeat a force bill which, if it had been enacted into law, would have taken the government of the Southern States out of the hands of the capable white people and turned it over to the scalawags, carpetbaggers, and the former negro slaves. In those days partisan rancon and sectional hatred were intense. Feeling ran so high that it seemed that everything was lost sight of by some northern statesmen except the lust for revenge. War had dethroned the reason of men, hate poisoned the heart, and avarice and greed ruled the land. Blinded by the prejudices that grew out of that war, certain men designed to put black heels upon white necks and enthrone congenital incompetency, and denied to the sons and daughters of the men and women who conceived our incomparable plan of government and cemented with their blood the foundations upon which it was reared the right to rule their own land. But, thank God, that spirit no longer exists among our friends, the white people of the North. A few relics of the unhappy past may yet lag superfluous on the stage; but, thank Heaven, they are few and growing beautifully less every day. I do not share the apprehension of some of my southern senatorial brethren that there is any possibility of limited cloture being used by any majority, however great that majority may be, of northern Republicans to put the ignorant and incompetent negro to rule over the white people of the South. Of course, they could not do it if they wanted to, and would not if they could. My observations in the Chamber has convinced me that all the patriotism and all the love of country and all of the liberality of judgment is not limited to those geographical subdivisions of the country represented in this Chamber by Democrats. I find the broad American spirit here on either side of this center aisle, and when it comes to dealing with this special problem which is of such vast importance to us of the South—in truth the paramount problem of the Nation—there is quite as much intelligence, broad patriotism, and disposition to do the right thing—the thing needful for the preservation of the purity of the white race and the conservation of our civilization—among the northern Republicans as there is among the northern Democrats. In both cases it is after all only a question of information, of knowledge of the situation, and all the facts involved in the problem. Times have changed and viewpoints have changed with them; so I am not pestered about that phase of the problem.

The fact of the business is, all of the constitutional amendments which have been adopted by the Southern States, for the purpose of eliminating the negro from politics, and making it possible for the white man to govern by law in spite of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, are merely palliatives, expedients—anesthetics administered to relieve the suffering patient temporarily. The great issue still remains to be solved, and the sooner the Nation shall be confronted with it the sooner we shall extirpate the evil. Every day that passes while this great problem remains unsolved multiplies difficulties and renders it the more difficult of final settlement. It ought to be met, not in the spirit of hate or race prejudice—politics has no place in the consideration of it, but it ought to be met bravely, wisely, patriotically, and it ought to be solved now. I recognize the dangers involved—the painful ordeal through which the Southern States must pass before being relieved of this incubus, but it is a condition that confronts us, and it ought to be met intelligently without hesitation and delay. I would rather settle it now than to bequeath it to my children and the generations to follow us. No, I am not opposed to cloture on that account. I think this resolution ought to pass. It guarantees ample time for full and complete discussion, and after that is had there ought to be the vote. I have always been in favor of cloture, but I would prefer that the rule would provide for the invocation of the cloture by a majority rather than by a two-thirds vote. I believe in majority rule. I have been ready to vote for such a resolution ever since I came to the Senate, but would prefer to make it just a little bit more radical and easy of application. I am willing, however, to take this modified form, because it seems to suit pretty nearly everybody.

I desire to repeat, Mr. President, that in my judgment nothing has happened in the immediate past which has changed my views upon the subject The fact is, I feel this afternoon that there is really less necessity for the passage of such a resolution at this time than heretofore.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a moment. I have perhaps received as much criticism for the position I took on the armed-neutrality bill as has any other Senator in this body. I find no fault with that. I feel I am hardly entitled to the honor that has been given me by the metropolitan press. I want to assure the Senate that I do not rise for the purpose of making an apology. I was opposed to the bill providing for armed neutrality, and I was opposed to it from patriotic motives.

I was opposed to it from the standpoint of an American citizen, believing as I do that my first solemn duty is to protect the American people from a cruel, bloody war. God knows that my only purpose has been, is, and shall be to protect the lives of American citizens and prevent the sinister influences back of this war movement to force our country into war with any of the belligerent nations of Europe.

I have no criticism to make of the Senator who is courageous enough to say that he wants war with a foreign nation; I find no fault with the man who has the courage of his convictions, and says that he believes it would be beneficial for this Government to be plunged into war; but I do find fault with those who are playing upon patriotic phrases, who are fooling the American people and trying to show that it is for the purpose of keeping this country out of war that they desired to pass that bill.

In his message delivered at a joint session of the two Houses of Congress on February 26, 1917, President Wilson said:

> I can not in circumstance be unmindful of the fact that the expiration of the term of the present Congress is immediately at hand, by constitutional limitation, and that it would in all likelihood require an unusual length of time to assemble and organize the Congress which is to succeed it. I feel that I ought, in view of that fact, to obtain from you full and immediate assurance of the authority which I may need at any moment to exercise. No doubt I already possess that authority without special warrant of law, by the plain implication of my constitutional duties and powers; but I prefer, in the present circumstances, not to act upon general implication.

The President specifically says that he is authorized under the law to arm American ships without any special law being passed by the Congress. If he has the authority to do the things which the provisions in the armed neutrality bill would confer upon him, why should we so hastily pass legislation which embodies fundamental principles upon which no two Senators have been able to agree? If the President has the power which he claims to have under the law and under the Constitution, why should this bill have been passed without full deliberation and debate, especially when no two Senators who were for the bill agreed upon the interpretation of the law and the provisions of the bill? If the President has the power which he says he has, and he believes that it is important to arm American ships for the purpose of protecting American lives and maintaining peace, why does he not do so? Or can it be possible that the President of the United States wants Congress to give him the power to declare war? The President was reelected to his high position not upon the issue of arming American ships but upon the single issue of having kept this Nation out of war.

I say most emphatically that it was not necessary to pass the armed neutrality bill in order to enable the President of the United States to maintain the position he has promised the American people he would pursue. The American people were promised by Woodrow Wilson and his friends in the last campaign, that if Wilson was reelected, friendly relations would be maintained with all the belligerent nations of Europe. They were promised that a "peace policy" and not a "war policy" would be carried out. This made the campaign a nonpartisan one, and thousands of loyal Republicans gave their support to Wilson because of these promises.

There is not a Member of the Senate so dull as not to know that armed neutrality means war. There is not a Member on this floor who fails to realize that if we had passed the bill which was pending before this body a few days ago it would be possible not only to ship munitions of war across the sea to belligerent nations, but it would be possible to convoy by our naval vessels merchant ships loaded with war material. Is there a Senator here, I ask, who will deny that that would have meant war?

Mr. President, I am no coward. If war must come, there will be some of my family on the firing line ready to fight and if needs be to die in defense of the flag and the preservation of this Union. Perhaps that is more than some of those who are so anxious to plunge this country into war can say; but I do not believe that we should unnecessarily plunge this country into war with any of the belligerent nations of Europe. I do not believe that this country should sacrifice millions of lives for the purpose of coining their blood into dollars. If war must come, then, sir, I believe that every patriotic citizen of this country will be ready to fight and to defend the flag; but it has been my conviction—and my actions and purposes have been directed to that end—that we should try to keep our country out of war; that we should not take sides with any of the belligerent nations; that we should remain neutral.

Mr. President, I have no criticism to make of Senators or of the President for having spoken so unkindly of the men who saw fit, in the discharge of their solemn duty, to oppose the armed merchant ship bill. In the words of the Master, as they fell from His immaculate lips, "Forgive them, for they know not what they do."

As to the pending resolution, I do not think it should be passed at this time. I think it is dangerous for a great Government like ours to deny a minority, small though it may be, an opportunity to be heard. Every republic that has disintegrated and gone to pieces has perished because of the very fact that the minority has been refused a hearing. I am opposed to an oligarchy; I am opposed to autocratic government; I believe in a democracy. I am surprised to find men who have advocated progressive measures rising to-day on this floor seeking to take away from the minority the possibility of being heard. I think it is a mistake. I do not believe that we are going to better conditions by passing the resolution now before us.

Of course, Mr. President, I think I understand that at this time it is exceedingly dangerous for those in the minority, in spite of their courage, to oppose a strong majority, without being subjected to the most severe and unfair criticism. I also realize that it is difficult for the minority to get justice from the press; but, Mr. President, that does not deter me from doing what I believe to be my conscientious duty. We have certain men in office to-day; a few years from now others will take their places. Let us not in our enthusiasm be carried away as hero worshipers, but let us remember that it is more important to maintain the principles and dignity of the office. I do not wish to do anything that will even have the slightest tendency to destroy in the smallest degree the liberty and freedom of this great Government of ours. Too much precious blood has been shed to establish it; too many lives were sacrificed to perpetuate it; and I shall not by any act of mine do anything that will cause any disturbance or that will have the least tendency to destroy it as a democracy.

Mr. President, I did not have an opportunity to speak upon the bill providing for armed neutrality. The Senator having that bill in charge took up nearly all the time and even refused to yield for questions. He occupied an hour and three-quarters, I believe, in denunciation of those who stood ready to carry out their honest beliefs. I did not during the last session occupy to exceed three hours, I believe, of the time of the Senate. On one or two occasions I did take some time in discussing the agricultural appropriation bill. Nor do I think I am subject to criticism for so doing, for I was a member of the committee which had that bill in charge.

Mr. President, I shall not take any more of the time of the Senate, because it might perhaps be said that I was doing so for the purpose of delaying the passage of this resolution. I simply want to repeat what I have said, that I have no apology to make for my action in trying to defeat the armed-neutrality bill. I was opposed to that bill, and am still opposed to it. If the bill were again before the Senate, I should talk against it and I should vote against it; but I have at no time had an idea that I could take up sufficient time to defeat it or to make it impossible to have it placed on its final passage.

If it had been presented to the Senate earlier in the session, it would not have been possible for a small minority to obstruct its passage. But the resolution had not been fully discussed and it should not be passed, and no bill of such tremendous importance should be passed without a free and full discussion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I shall not consume the time of the Senate, but I deem it important that the RECORD should distinctly show that this rule is not adopted as the result of any excitement caused by occurrences of the past week. For several weeks past a number of Senators on each side contemplated bringing this matter to the attention of the Senate at this time and asking for the immediate adoption of substantially this rule.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. STONE. I have no doubt that what the Senator says is absolutely correct; but here I ask his leave to say that if the occurrences of the last week have resulted in bringing about a change in the rules by which the Senate can do some business, then the occurrences have not been wholly in vain.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish also to add that this rule is the work of Senators, and not of anybody outside of the Senate; and I may be justified in expressing the opinion that no one outside of the Senate is as capable of framing as wise a Senate rule as is any member of the joint committee that considered the subject.

Now, Mr. President, I ask that there be printed in the RECORD the resolution in full, as it was reported from the Rules Committee last May.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolution referred to is as follows:

[S. Res. 195. (Report No. 447.) In the Senate of the United States. May 16, 1916. Mr. SMITH of Georgia, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following resolution; which was placed on the calendar. Calendar No. 416.]

Resolution.

Resolved, That the standing rules of the Senate be, and they hereby are, amended as follows: At the close of Rule XXII add:

"Provided, however, That if 16 Senators present to the Senate at any time a signed motion to bring to a close the debate upon any pending measure, the Presiding Officer shall at once state the motion to the Senate and at the close of the morning hour on the following calendar day lay the motion before the Senate and direct that the Secretary call the roll, and, upon the ascertainment that a quorum is present, the Chair shall, without debate, submit to the Senate by an aye-and-nay vote the question:

"'Is it the sense of the Senate that the debate shall be brought to a close?'

"And if that question shall be decided in the affirmative by a two-thirds vote of those voting, then said measure shall be in order to the exclusion of all other business, except a motion to recess or adjourn.

"Thereafter no Senator shall be entitled to speak more than one hour on the bill, the amendments thereto, and motions affecting the same, and it shall be the duty of the Chair to keep the time of each Senator who speaks. No dilatory motions shall be in order, and all points of order and appeals from the decision of the Chair shall be decided without debate."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE obtained the floor.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. WATSON. Is it true that the committee having this matter in charge on the other side of the Chamber presented the matter to the President of the United States for his direct personal approval?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is not.

Mr. WATSON. It is not true? The statement, then, that was made in the press to that effect is incorrect?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I know nothing of the statement in the press; but I have answered categorically the question of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I did not intend to take any of the time of the Senate upon the pending resolution, but as I sat here listening to the debate I was reminded of another debate, many years ago, upon the subject of cloture which engaged the attention of the Senate while I was a Member of the House. That debate was in 1891, and it occurred to me to send for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I also called for the volumes covering other periods when the same subject had been before the Senate. I have before me three volumes of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD containing the reports of discussions which occurred in the Senate when attempts have been made to pass in some form a measure of cloture.

I know how prone we are, sir, in our youth, perhaps, to color somewhat the occurrences and events that then transpire. It has very often seemed to me—and I hope I will not offend against the proprieties if I say that I have had occasion to remark many times upon the public platform that it has seemed to me—that the level of statesmanship of our time in this body would scarcely measure up to that of the Senate as I knew it 30 years ago. As I listened to the debate to-day I trust my colleagues here will pardon me for saying that it occurred to me that the debate at this time hardly rose to the importance of the occasion. So, sir, I shall venture to trespass upon the Senate a sufficient time to put into the RECORD some quotations from the arguments made when a similar attempt at cloture heretofore was made in the Senate of the United States. This matter may not interest the Senate, but I shall read it into the RECORD in order that it may go elsewhere, to be read and considered.

The present resolution is not in the same form in which cloture resolutions were presented at other times. At one time it was proposed to make cloture depend upon the vote of the majority. I have been interested in the two views which Senators on either side take of the present resolution. By some Senators it is contended that this resolution is scarcely a cloture at all, while still others give expression to the hope that we shall very soon have cloture in its real form.

Mr. President—and until I shall have opportunity to do so in a more ample way, this is the only reference I propose to make at this time to the events of the last week—supposing the rule of cloture here proposed had been in force during the session of Congress just closed, would anybody question seriously that the exigencies of the occasion, as seen in some quarters and by at least a majority of this body, would have been sufficient to command at any time just as readily the two-thirds vote of this body as a majority vote?

Here we were in the closing days of a short session with the appropriation bills held back as perhaps rarely if ever before in the history of legislation—why, I do not pretend to say; I do not know. I do know that the Army appropriation bill, I do know that the naval appropriation bill, and some of the other appropriation bills, carried larger appropriations not only than ever before in the history of the Government, sir, but that the military and naval appropriation bills carried in themselves alone appropriations as large as were required for the entire purposes of our Federal Government only a little more than a decade ago.

Mr. President, were those bills so long in coming before the Senate because it was undesirable that they should be discussed here? In 1907 and 1908 the naval appropriations amounted to only $131,000,000. I remember the figures because I had taken some pains to make special investigation with respect to the naval appropriation bill of that year and participated in the debate upon it with other Senators of the same mind as myself on this floor. That was in 1908, and in the few years that have elapsed it has jumped, Mr. President, to the enormous total of $532,000,000! That such a bill should have been delayed somewhere until only four or five days before the close of the session; that the military appropriation bill did not come before the Senate at all for consideration and was reported from the committee—I will ask the Senator from Oregon what day he reported it?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It came to the Senate from the House, I think, on Saturday, and was reported here on the following Wednesday.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. What day of the month, and what month?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not recall the day.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, Mr. President, I believe it was the Wednesday before the life of the Senate expired on Sunday. Less than four days, sir, were left of the life of this Senate when that great bill was brought in here! The general deficiency bill and the sundry civil bill, covering appropriations for the Government service in all parts of the country, were also delayed somewhere, as these bills, with other appropriation bills, came crowding in during the last hours of the session.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUGHES in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. The Army bill was reported, according to the calendar, on the 28th of February.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The 28th of February, and we were to adjourn on the 4th of March.

Mr. President, that bill contained legislative provisions never before presented to an American Congress. Universal military training was embodied in it. With all of the other subjects involving great increases in expenditures, there was this proposition involving a complete change of policy, and the Senate must dispose of it within five days. There were piled up here these great appropriation bills carrying important and far-reaching changes in our law; propositions that should be thoroughly digested before action should be had; and on top of all that, about 50 hours before the Congress was to adjourn, there was brought in a bill of uncertain grant of power to another department, a bill which in the minds of the best students of constitutional government, the best authorities on international law, trenches upon the constitutional authority of Congress, and seeks to invest in another department of this Government powers denied by the Constitution. With your calendar loaded with these immense appropriation bills, carrying unheard-of propositions of legislation, you then bring in a bill of that character and demand that debate shall be made to conform to that condition of things!

With a rule such as is here proposed in force at that time, with an iron hand laid upon this body from outside, with a Congress that in three years has reduced itself to little more than a rubber stamp, let me ask you, Mr. President, if you do not think a rule of this sort would be bound to be pretty effective cloture? Especially is that true as some of the proposed legislation was of a character that appealed to certain Senators upon this side of the Chamber, who coming from States where the manufacture of munitions is a mighty important industry, are impressed with legislation that benefits the interests they represent?

Mr. President, believing that I stand for democracy, for the liberties of the people of this country, for the perpetuation of our free institutions, I shall stand while I am a Member of this body against any cloture that denies free and unlimited debate. Sir, the moment that the majority imposes the restriction contained in the pending rule upon this body, that moment you will have dealt a blow to liberty, you will have broken down one of the greatest weapons against wrong and oppression that the Members of this body possess. This Senate is the only place in our system where, no matter what may be the organized power behind any measure to rush its consideration and to compel its adoption, there is a chance to be heard, where there is opportunity to speak at length, and where, if need be, under the Constitution of our country and the rules as they stand to-day, the constitutional right is reposed in a Member of this body to halt a Congress or a session on a piece of legislation which may undermine the liberties of the people and be in violation of the Constitution which Senators have sworn to support. When you take that power away from the Members of this body, you let loose in a democracy forces that in the end will be heard elsewhere, if not here.

Now, sir, along that line, I want to put into the record of the extraordinary proceeding that is to be carried out here the most thoughtful words and reflections of some of our ablest statesmen. I regret, sir, that I had not the time to examine the RECORD at greater length. The very fact that from its earlier days there has been free discussion in the Senate, and that the ablest and the most patriotic statesmanship of the country has overwhelmingly defeated the kind of a rule pending here to-day, seems to me should make Senators hesitate to bring in this resolution and secure its immediate consideration.

Had I been on the floor at the moment this resolution was reported—I came in a minute or two later—I would, of course, have interposed an objection to its being disposed of to-day. It is too vastly important. It has been considered in all time by the Senate of the United States as too vastly important to be disposed of in any summary way. Whenever it has been brought before this body heretofore it has been debated at great length and most seriously both by the Members who favored it and by the Members who opposed it.

I do not say, Mr. President, that arguments can not be furnished for it. I do not say that the proceedings of the last hours of the recent session do not furnish such argument, and those proceedings made the occasion for bringing forward this rule at this time. At another time it could not have been done. But when there is interposed here on this floor an obstacle to the exercise of a constitutional right—for a constitutional right includes your rights under the rules which the Constitution says this body shall adopt, and in resisting legislation that overturns the Constitution—it includes the exercise of all of your rights under those rules, Mr. President.

I promised myself, when I took the floor, not to discuss that, so with that statement I stop.

Mr. President, I shall read the argument made by Mr. Turpie, of Indiana, when a similar resolution was before the Senate. It covers one or two pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. After that I shall quote from Mr. Spooner and Judge Gray, then a Member of the Senate, Mr. Teller, and perhaps two or three others, whose names I have before me. I regret that I could not have had time to read through these debates and put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD such portions as I believe should be considered by Senators before they vote on this measure.

Let me say to the new Members who have been recently sworn in here that it may seem to you a very reasonable proposition. The Senators supporting it say, "Why, two-thirds must be in favor of it." But, Senators, you will find before you have been here very long that there is an organization upon each side of this Chamber; that each organization arranges the committee assignments for its side; and that the way the committees are constructed at the beginning of the life of every Congress means the control of legislation for the entire Congress. Then, having so apportioned the Members of this body in committee arrangements, if it seems to be the will of the combined organizations, it is an easy matter to hold back the legislation in those committees until the last hours of the session. When that time comes, the desire of Senators to get away, to go to their homes, the desire to take care of the departments, to be out from under the criticism of having held up appropriation bills and starved the Government—all that, Mr. President, comes upon them with a weight that is irresistible; and one after another they break down and yield, and the program goes through, no matter what it may contain. This rule will furnish an additional incentive to hold back important legislation until the closing hours of a session, as it makes the majority certain of success in carrying through its program.

I think, sir, that I will first read a brief passage or two from the very able and extended address of former Senator Gray, now an honored member of the Federal judiciary. At one point in his discussion of the 22d of January, 1891 (reading):

Mr. GRAY. It is all a farce to talk about the reasonable limit of debate in the opinion of majorities—

This was a majority proposition. His reasoning would make it just as applicable to a majority of two-thirds.

It is all a farce to talk about the reasonable limit of debate in the opinion of majorities, if you are to be content that free speech and liberty of debate have any place longer in American institutions.

You say that the power of obstruction must be put down, must be taken from the minority, that it is intolerable, this opportunity and liberty of obstruction that the minority has, when the majority makes up its mind. Very well. Let us destroy the power of obstruction and you have destroyed free parliamentary government. Obstruction is the very weapon of liberty in all English-speaking countries. There is no unimpeded path for a majority to walk in, no unobstructed road for its will to be worked through, unless that road and that path lead to despotism. Obstruction in parliamentary proceedings by a minority has been the fruitful source of some of the grandest achievements of human liberty that this world has known. You can not do away with it. You can not destroy it without at the same time doing away with the muniments of freedom and destroying liberty itself.

We can put up with obstruction, we can pay the price of our liberties, Mr. President; we can dispense with the haste and with the so-called business methods that obtain in some parliamentary bodies, because we are willing to pay the price of liberty. If you want a smoothly working machine, if you want a governmental framework that will produce at the least expense and in the shortest time given results, then I say go to your despotism, go to a crowned czar, or go to an unrestrained majority, an unobstructed majority, and there you will get results speedily, quickly, and inexpensively, without cost of time. But you will get other results, too. The spirit of freedom will have to die and the spirit of American liberty will have to suffer a fatal lesion before that desirable state of things can be brought about.

I pass over some of this. Still quoting from former Senator Gray, from the same debate, I read the following. Let me say that he had been interrupted and reminded that the British Parliament, under the leadership of Gladstone, had adopted a cloture. His reply to that matter, which was brought to his attention by the Senator from Rhode Island, Mr. Aldrich, was as follows:

Mr. President, Mr. Gladstone at the time he led his party in the adoption of that rule was the inveterate, uncompromising foe of home rule in Ireland. He was deaf to their appeals. He would not listen to the argument or to the speech of those who were defending its people and pleading for its women and children. But, sir, since that unhappy day Mr. Gladstone was great enough and big enough and grand enough to put behind him the errors he then committed, and to come out and place himself at the head of that gallant band of Englishmen who are fighting to-day for the liberty of Ireland.

Now:

No, Mr. President, we do not need to cross the Atlantic yet for examples to follow in order that we may stifle debate on the floor of the Senate of the United States. That example does not commend itself to the good sense and to the patriotic instincts of the American people. Cloture, this foreigner, with strange air and mien, who can not talk the English-American speech, who has not the accent of liberty on his tongue, comes here and is knocking at the door of the Senate for admission and to be taken in and made at home. It may do in France; it may do in Austria; it may do in Germany; but it will not thrive when transplanted on American soil—

That great Democrat, Mr. President, will live to bow his head at the action forced upon the Senate of the United States by the great majority of his own party now here.

Listen to him further:

and I predict that it will wither and die before another year has rolled around.

What did Bentham say, that great political philosopher?

"In France the terrible decrees of urgency for the closing of discussion may well be remembered with dread. They were formed for the subjugation of the minority and for the purpose of stifling argument which they dreaded."

And that is the purpose here. It is the purpose everywhere where it has ever been applied. In the countries where it obtained as an institution, censorship of the press went hand in hand with it. You can not stifle free debate and also keep a free press. You will after a while get impatient of the strictures and the criticisms of a free, untrammeled press.

Alien and sedition laws are of kindred blood with this rule. They did not flourish long in American soil. But they were good men who voted for these alien and sedition laws. I can see them now with their periwigged heads and their ruffled shirts and their buff vests and shad-belly coats, the very essence of respectability. They represented the conservative classes. They were good fathers, and good husbands, and good citizens, and good neighbors, and they were somewhat shocked and scandalized at the freedom of the press, and they said, as the Senator from Vermont would say or has said in substance, "Oh, we do not oppose liberty; it is license that we oppose. We do not oppose freedom of debate; it is only unreasonable freedom of debate that we oppose." And so they said, "The liberty of the press is dear to us; but, my friend, you must recollect there is a difference between liberty and license.

"License will not do."

He is still quoting from these gentlemen:

"Liberty of the press—we grant that. Let us see the article. Well, that may do; it is coming very near the verge of license, though; and, if it does, then the alien and sedition law, scandalum magnatum, must apply, and the editor must abide the pains and penalties. You must recollect in conducting this sheet that you are not to cross the line. Liberty we ought to maintain. Liberty! We all love liberty. Liberty of the press is one of the watchwords of freedom. But license, oh, that is a different thing. License tends to the demoralization of the community; license tends to the sapping of the foundations of social order, and it will not do to tolerate it."

Resuming his argument he said:

And so Senators will find, when you attempt to draw the distinction between freedom of debate and what is unreasonable freedom of debate, that you will run into the same shadowy ground, and you will find yourself trespassing upon the liberties that belong to all American citizens, and you will find you can not erect any standard between liberty and license; you have got to leave it to work itself out by the good sense of the people themselves; and that has served from the beginning until now to save us from all the results that were prophesied from untrammeled liberty of the press.

Mr. President, this measure is obnoxious to every sentiment of American freedom. Its companions are such as I have described. It must go hand in hand with alien and sedition laws and with the censorship of the press, as it has in all the countries whence the cloture, this foreigner, this exotic, has come.

I do hope, I do believe, I express the confidence now as an American Senator, that there will be no line drawn in that alley that shall separate the friends and opponents of this measure, but that the votes will cross that line and there will be a majority—I trust not a partisan majority, but a majority of American Senators who will continue to vindicate the great principles of American liberty and parliamentary freedom as they have existed for a hundred years in the Senate of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, I read just a paragraph from former Senator Teller. He makes in his opening sentence some reference to the statehood bill, to which reference had been made in the course of the debate:

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I am myself very much in favor of the statehood bill and prepared to do anything which I think is just and consistent with my duty here to further that object. I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Spooner], the chairman of the Committee on Rules, as to the desirability of maintaining in this body the right of free discussion. I have myself had occasion in the number of years I have served here to see the advantage of it.

I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar] that the bill, which he thinks did not have any element of force in it, would have become a law if we had had a cloture rule. I myself was an active opponent of that bill. If it did not have the element of force in it, it had in it, in my judgment at that time, the element of fraud, and created an opportunity for dishonest people to meddle with elections. But I do not care to discuss that question. I believe that discussion created a sentiment and belief in this body—and it was very much of the character which has been expressed in the debate which is going on here this morning—that it was not wise to pass that bill. While that bill was not voted on directly, the men who voted to displace it were the men who would have voted against it if there had been a vote taken upon it.

Mr. President, I have been a little restive sometimes, and probably once or twice I have said some things which I ought not to have said as to the length of the discussion on the statehood bill, but I myself will not vote for anything, directly or indirectly, which will indicate the right of the majority to censure the minority, or that will look directly or indirectly to any method, either legal or moral, which may prevent any Senator from exercising his judgment in securing delay whenever he thinks he ought to do so.

I believe that there ought to be somewhere in the Government of this country a place where unrestricted and untrammeled debate may be had. I believe it was the purpose of the creation of this body that deliberation and thought and delay might be secured for great questions which might for the time being unduly agitate the public mind, either because of intense partisanship or for any other reason.

He could not have had in mind, Mr. President, the impending horror of war, but some lesser excitement where he thought it would be justifiable for any Senator to exercise his rights on this floor to delay; and when I refer to a war measure I refer to one that does not threaten invasion, not one which infringes upon rights which have not already been surrendered—and I believe that there is nothing which can so secure to the American people righteous and just legislation as the right on this floor to discuss in every way and to delay by every method which shall meet the approval of Senators acting under oath all bills or measures which they think are improper and unwise.

Mark you, the attempt to get cloture here was following a debate protracted not only days but weeks.

I was delighted—

Says Senator Teller—

I was delighted to hear the chairman of the Committee on Rules say what he has said this morning. I believe he expresses the best thought of this body when he says that he is in favor of untrammeled debate and unrestricted obstruction when, in the judgment of Senators, such a course is necessary.

I now turn to read a few words from former Senator Spooner, who was at that time chairman of the Committee on Rules. In the first statement that I will read many Senators who are altogether new to this body or have been here perhaps for only a term will find reflection in their own minds of the sentiment which he expresses as to how he was impressed when he first entered this body as to this matter.

There was a time when I was in favor of cloture—

Says Senator Spooner—

There was a time when I was in favor of a cloture. I have been a Member of this body now for 12 years. I have been very constant in my attendance upon its sessions; I have been somewhat active in all controverted matters which have been before the Senate. I have seen times when Members of this body, impelled not by partisanship but only by the strongest possible motives of conscience, felt constrained to resist the passage of measures which they thought were unconstitutional, or which they thought, if constitutional and passed, would be subversive of great public interests.

I am frank to admit that years ago, when I was first a Member of the Senate and a struggle of that kind came, I was very restive under it. I thought that a minority ought not to be able to obstruct the passage of legislation.

But, Mr. President, I do not believe there is any legislative body in this world which accomplishes as much in a deliberate, thoughtful, and careful way as the Senate accomplishes under its existing rules. The very freedom which is accorded to Senators here assures debate, which would not occur if we had a previous question. There would of necessity be an exclusion of many from debate.

I have often seen in the newspapers and I have often heard it said that debate is of no effect in this body. That is not true. I appeal to every Senator here if the contrary is not true, as is shown at every session repeatedly upon full debate, because Senators desire here to get at the right. Sometimes we are constrained by political prejudice and more or less of partisanship where proposed legislation may have a political phase, but in the matters of legislation almost universally debate in this body has had great weight, and many Members have risen and acknowledged a change of view because of a discussion which has taken place. It would be quite absurd to have it understood that debate is of no consequence here.

This power to stop the hasty passage of bills by a single objection in the afternoon sometimes when we take up the calendar has been of infinite benefit to the country. We rely largely upon committees. Sometimes the committees act hastily and improvidently—all the committees. Sometimes bills are reported along toward the end of the session by a poll of the members of the committee, and it has often happened that objection to a bill has delayed it for an hour until the Senator in charge could explain it; and it has often happened the delay brought about a conference which disclosed a defect in the bill which was remedied by amendment.

It is true that when a bill is objected to by a single Senator it is possible, under the rules, to move to proceed to its consideration. I appeal to Senators that that rarely becomes necessary, and by common consent, as a rule, when a measure is objected to it goes over for examination, and that delay seldom fails to be useful.

For one I have become convinced that under the rules of the Senate as they are the interest of the public, of the whole country, is better subserved than it would be had we a cloture.

Now, Mr. President, I want to invite the attention of Senators to a most remarkable argument, one which has impressed me very strongly. It contains views upon this question which, I think, should have a place in this debate; but I do not wish to take the time to-night. I know Senators are anxious to act upon this resolution, and if I can omit portions of this I will be very glad to do so. I understand that I have consent to print it all.

Really, then, the true rule——

Mr. OVERMAN. From whom is the Senator reading?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. From Senator Turpie, of Indiana. Senator Turpie was regarded in his service, and I think he has been since by all Senators familiar with the debates, as one of the ablest constitutional lawyers who ever sat in this body.

Really, then, the true rule is there is but one way, and has been but one way since 1806, of procuring or bringing about a vote of the Senate upon any measure, and that way is the way of unanimous consent. Theoretically one might think, if that is the case and one Member of this body may at any time prevent a vote upon any measure, legislation has not been very frequent, has been very rare, has been very uncommon in this branch; but practically it will be seen that the one Member objecting to unanimous consent, this missing unit, has been always absent. He has been conspicuous by his absence. So that votes upon the passage of bills, final votes upon the determination of any questions whatever have been as frequent here as in the other branch of the National Legislature; and taking the whole body of legislation, subjected as it has been to this rule in the Senate that a vale can not be taken without unanimous consent, whatever other effect the rule has had it has not had the effect to diminish the amount or quantity of legislation or the sum of useful, important, and effectual legislation upon all subjects which the people demanded.

It is very often said, sir, that the majority in this country rules—I have heard it repeated once or twice in the discussion upon the question of cloture—and, therefore, that the majority in this body should rule. That statement is much too broad, whether it be applied to the whole country or to the Senate of the United States. It is much better made in this way, and can be only truly made in this way: the will of the majority expressed under the form of law, or in the form of law, or by the form of law, or in accordance with the form of law, governs in this country and governs in this body, as will be seen in the sequel.

The first form of law to which the majority is subject is the Constitution of the United States, and with respect to this body the second form of law is its own rules. The majority in this body controls its action when action is taken. It passes a bill or defeats a bill. But the majority in this body has never decided either when action shall be taken or whether action shall be taken at all. That has always depended upon the unit, the smallest possible minority. It is the smallest conceivable minority of this body which determines the question when action or whether action shall be taken.

I heard this body characterized the other day as a voting body. I disclaim that epithet very distinctly. I have heard it described elsewhere as a debating body. I disclaim that with equal disfavor. This body is best determined by its principal characteristic. The universal law and genius of language have given a name to this body derived from its principal attribute. It is a deliberative body—the greatest deliberative body in the world.

Now, voting is an incident to deliberation, and debate is an incident to deliberation; but when a body is chiefly characterized as deliberative there is much deliberation apart from discussion and debate, and wholly apart from what is called the business of voting.

The essence and the spirit of a body like ours, now over a century old, may be best gathered from its rules of action, the body of law governing it always very small, now very brief. Of the 21 rules properly affecting parliamentary procedure in this body 11 relate to the subject of deliberation. More than one-half relate exclusively to that subject and have nothing to do with debate or voting. I suppose that the form of law under which the will of the majority must control this body embraces at least the rules which govern us. Here is Rule XXII, one which touches us every day. I think it is the most frequently operative of any rule in the Senate.

Then he gives Rule XXII, as follows:

"RULE XXII.

"PRECEDENCE OF MOTIONS.

"When a question is pending no motion shall be received, but—
"To adjourn,
"To adjourn to a day certain, or that when the Senate adjourn, it shall be to a day certain,
"To take a recess,
"To proceed to the consideration of executive business,
"To lay on the table,
"To postpone indefinitely,
"To postpone to a day certain,
"To commit,
"To amend;
"which several motions shall have precedence as they stand arranged."

Now, there is not a single one of these motions which relates to a vote of this assembly, to debate by it, but all relate primarily to the business of this body, which is deliberation, and they are all what are called dilatory motions relating only to deliberation. Take, for instance, the motion to adjourn What relation has that to the merits of any bill or measure pending before this body? Take the motion to adjourn, the first in precedence, taking precedence of any question pending here, what possible relation has that to the merits of any question pending? None.

What is the reason, then, why the motion to adjourn has attached to it this superlative excellence that it shall be first in order and shall precede all others? I have heard it very frequently said the motion to adjourn is always in order, and it is very seldom out of order. The chair is bound almost in any circumstances to entertain it. It has become almost a maxim, the motion to adjourn is always in order. It has not been always in order. The rule is only as old as the revolution of 1688. Prior to that time the house could not adjourn (I am speaking of another parliamentary body) while the speaker remained in the chair; and the speaker, a servile tool of the Crown, remained in the chair 26, 48, even at one time, as it is said, 50 hours, failing to recognize the motion to adjourn, refusing to put it, refusing to consider it, and holding the body in session simply by his presence in the chair.

It was under such necessity that the rule now become a maxim, the statute now worn out, has become the common law of parliamentary bodies, that the motion to adjourn shall always be in order; and the reason given for it is that private conference among members is preferable to debate, and that the body must always have an opportunity at least of resorting to privy conference if it so determine.

I might go on and notice each of these nine dilatory motions in detail to show how every one of them relates solely to deliberation, to show how this Rule XXII, connected as it is with all our procedure here, daily, hourly, has characterized and will characterize this body as long as it exists as preeminently deliberative.

All these dilatory motions resting jn Rule XXII have their foundation in a rule yet older than any in this compilation. It is a rule older than the Senate of the United States itself. All these dilatory motions relating to deliberation, so carefully guarded, so long observed, so characteristic of the Senate of the United States, are founded upon a rule not published in this body of rules, neither numbered nor classified. The first rule to which all our rules are subject, sir, the first rule of parliamentary procedure proper, is found in the Constitution of the United States:

"The yeas and nays of the Members of either House on any question shall, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, be entered on the Journal."

The whole series of dilatory motions and parliamentary action upon subjects here rests for foundation upon the rule I have just read from the Constitution of the United States. I speak of it as the first rule of this body. It is the first. It is older than any of the other rules. It is the first; it is a part of the paramount law of the land.

One might think, in reading it casually, that there had certainly been a mistake by the framers of the Constitution; that, as was said of Homer, they nodded when they put such a mere surface, at first thought, provision into and made it a part of the organic law, as they might have provided in that instrument, sir, that you should rise to your feet when putting a question to the body, or that a Senator in addressing you should rise from his seat.

Sir, this provision does not belong to that class. Why is it found in the Constitution of the United States? Senators have claimed here that a provision to cut off debate is absolutely necessary and of the highest superlative importance. Why was not that made a part of the Constitution of the United States? Senators have claimed here that a provision that a vote shall be and must be taken at some stage, at a certain stage—in other words, the closure—is imperious, is, in the language of the honorable and learned Senator from Connecticut, absolutely necessary to the transaction of what is called the business of the Senate and the business of the country.

Why, then, was not provision made for cloture in the Constitution of the United States? The question may be asked, Why should the Constitution makers have concerned themselves at all about a parliamentary rule for the government of this body? But as they have done so, it becomes very legitimate to ask why did they not provide for the cloture and for the cessation of debate, as it is said such rules exceed in necessity and importance all other parliamentary rules.

Let us examine this parliamentary rule in the Constitution. What was the object of it? Some man might say the object of this was to make a record. Sir, there was no necessity of such a provision to make a record. Records were made long before this provision of the Constitution. The majority had always the power to require the record to be made of a vote, and that was the former method; and the minority, a minority of one, had always the power to have his vote entered of record, either "nay" or "yea," and when all the nays were put in the record the absentees and the yeas were very apparent, and vice versa. There is not the slightest use in the intendment of common parliamentary law of the world then existing to have inserted for such a reason this provision in the Constitution of the United States.

Then it is said that the object of this provision was to assist in the passage of bills, or in other words to assist the business of enactment as distinguished from the business proper of this body, deliberation. Let us look at it in that view. It is not said that the yeas and nays of Members shall, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, be entered on any bill pending, on the passage of any bill pending; it is said "on any question," the most immaterial, the most irrelevant, the one most remotely connected with the business pending before this body. For instance, on the question of adjournment, the question to postpone indefinitely or to a certain day, the question to commit, the question to amend, on any of these dilatory motions one-fifth of the Members present may demand a roll call and a record; and that roll call and record was not, as I have shown very clearly, for the purpose of showing how a bill was passed; it relates to any question. Making a record was amply provided for. The reason of the roll call and record is that deliberation is the province of this body. It is the office of this body. Attendance may be compelled; deliberation is compelled by this rule. Voting is not compelled, can not be compelled.

This rule, sir, is found, as I have said before, in the organic law. It is much aggrandized, it is glorified by the company in which it is associated. This rule that one-fifth of the Members of this body may at any time demand a roll call is placed alongside of the inhibition against bills of attainder and ex post facto laws. It is placed alongside of the affirmative power of Congress to declare war, to conclude peace, to contract alliances. It is placed alonside of that great prerogative writ of personal liberty, habeas corpus.

It belongs to that character of legislation, except that habeas corpus may be suspended, but not even in case of invasion, not even in case of rebellion, can the great power of the potent fifth of the membership here ever be questioned, delayed, or ignored, no matter what is pending or how irrelevant it may be to what is called or may be thought the chief business of this body. The object of this rule was not to facilitate the passage of laws; it was not to make a record; it was to compel deliberation. It was to give to the minority a day in court. It may be a long day, broken, interrupted, full of excitement, in which a question is tossed from side to side as a ball between two animated bands of players. It is just in the midst of this excitement that the rule of the Constitution comes; that it says with imperious mandate, let this cease. Let the roll be called. Let your communication be yea, yea, and nay, nay. It makes a pause. It compels a pause. This rule is and always has been an element of force. It is not the cloture; it forces and compels deliberation, not enactment. It is on the side of the minority, not on that of the majority.

Now, take this form of law, the rule in the Constitution which I have just read, in connection with Rule XXII in our own body of law to which I have referred. Establish the proper connections between them, as we have often here seen done, and the operative relations, with the rule in the Constitution compelling a record, a roll call, and with the rule in our body compelling the entertainment in their order of nine different dilatory motions, having no possible reference to merits, it will be seen that under the form of law, the highest possible form of law, deliberation is distinctly the business, province, and the office of this body.

It will be seen how impossible under the operation even of the rule in the Constitution and how thoroughly inconceivably under the operation of our own rules it will be that debate can ever cease or that a vote can ever be taken as long as there is a dissenting unit in this Hall, assisted by one-fifth of the number. It would take a reconstruction of the entire body of laws of the Senate, if not an amendment to the Federal Constitution, peremptorily to enact what seems to be aimed at by the resolution of the Senator from Connecticut, and those modifications of the same now upon the table of the Senate, and yet the will of the majority rules in this body.

Is not the Constitution of the United States the will of the majority—a will of the majority, permanent, enduring; a law for all generations? Are not the rules of the Senate of the United States, most of them a hundred years old, the will of the majority, the permanent will? The will of the majority, it rules here in the same manner as elsewhere; the wish of the majority of the hour or of the day, the wish in regard to a pending measure, in regard to a pending bill, in regard to a pending enactment, in regard to any parliamentary action here, does not control. It is itself controlled and governed by the will of the majority, the law of the land and of the Senate.

The nine dilatory motions now compellable to be entertained by the Chair, the questions in relation to excuse, the questions in relation to appeal, without exhausting even a very small minority in this Chamber would in a parliamentary manner, in a distinctly constitutional manner, occupy the whole of the remainder of the present session of Congress. We must rely upon the assent of the fifth.

I am aware, sir, that such action as I have alluded to, action confined entirely to what are known as dilatory motions, is called obstruction, but I am not prepared, and I never heard any Senator here who expressed himself ready, to define the difference between obstruction and deliberation. One thing is very certain, the Constitution of the United States makes no distinction between obstruction and deliberation. It provides in express terms for deliberation in the very method which we of the hour might call obstruction.

It is the fortune, sir, of free parliamentary government to be subject to the sleepless vigil of dissent, of resistence, and of that sort of resistance which may end in revolution. The shadows of agitation and of revolution are constantly following the feet of those who are engaged in free parliamentary discussion and legislation. Behind obstruction at a greater or less distance is always agitation, and at some distance and at some time may be always revolution.

We have been frequently entertained here with a description of the hardships, and I do not wish to disparage them, of continuous session, of night sittings. They are very feeble antetypes, they are very frail mimic representations of the campfire and bivouac, but they do foreshadow them. I very much doubt, and I have thought a great deal about it and read something on the subject also, whether the establishment of cloture in this body would tend to increase the chances of public order, of public security, of wholesome agitation, and of legitimate resistance.

My impression is that the establishment of a cloture in this body would have the contrary tendency. I think that it would not diminish the real power of the minority. Cloture is after all suppression, repression here, to be harvested afterwards in boundless expansion elsewhere; and the statesman repressed, the member of this body suppressed, subjected to force and duress, returns for that very reason no longer of the minority, but with the majority behind him. A vote by force is not a vote either as to the time when it is taken or as to the character of the subject to which it relates or as to the place where it is cast. A vote by compulsion is not a free act; and yet the first definition of a vote is volition, the expression of the will, absolutely free, of the voter.

After all, as I have had occasion to remark upon subjects somewhat cognate, the very highest official functions in a free government are not compulsory and can not be made so. It is made the duty of the Vice President to recognize a Member who rises in this body and addresses him. Suppose he fails to do that; suppose he neglects to do that; suppose he wrongfully, knowingly, defiantly, refuses to recognize a Senator who addresses him, how shall we compel recognition? I am speaking of the action of the highest functionary. I know very well if the Secretary disobeys our orders, or if the Sergeant at Arms disobeys the rules governing him, the remedy is very swift, very complete, perfect; but with respect to the highest function and duty there is no remedial operation and can be none.

Of course it is possible that the officer might be punished; but that would not restore recognition. It is the duty of a Senator rising here to effect the Chair. It is the duty of a Senator under one of our rules to vote when his name is called. Suppose he does not vote and offers no excuse, how can we compel voting? That is a high function of a Member of this body, perhaps one of the highest; and the other, I think, is the very highest function belonging to the Chair, the function of recognition. It is the initiative in the great lesson of parliamentary liberty. Both these functions must depend—they do depend, Senators—upon the sanction of honor alone, stainless honor. They have no other sanction.

There is no obligation upon a Senator or upon the Vice President in respect to these high functions, except the sense of duty and the love of country. Heretofore these great sanctions have been sufficient. They have sufficed for all hours, for all days, for all perils, all dangers; but if they ever prove to be insufficient, how shall the sublime duties and motives, such as love of country and the obligation of conscience and honor, be supplied by the adoption of a parliamentary rule?

Formerly the edge of revolution came very near to obstruction. This was a parliamentary program of a body older than our own. Appropriation, revenue, and relief were put into the same budget and constituted a part of the same bill. For instance, such a proposition as the repeal of the Sherman Act, or any other conceivable relief, was not attached as an amendment to the budget, because that would have raised the question of cloture and of all other manner of deliberation, but it was placed originally in the same bill and reported with supplies, with appropriations.

Then, when the majority of the body defeated an appropriation and refused to grant supplies, defeating therewith relief, they attempted to take supplies by force, without the warrant of law, and that attempt to take supplies was resisted. The ayes and noes became bills and bows; obstruction blossomed into civil war. It was no uncommon thing, and happened three, four, or five times during the reign of the Stuarts and the sovereigns who preceded them.

I cite these examples for the purpose of showing, not that obstruction is illegitimate, but that it is an extreme remedy. Cloture itself belongs to the same class. I do not think that the rejection or establishment of cloture would determine much with respect to the right or power of a minority here or elsewhere; but I have been always of the opinion that constitutional deliberation, or, if you please to call it so, obstruction, is nearer the line of parliamentary freedom, of liberty of debate, than the other rule which is sought to be adopted, or at least is now being considered.

I am not taking the position that the cloture is unconstitutional, but it is in very sharp contrast—not in conflict, but in very sharp contrast—with the only parliamentary rule proper laid down in that instrument. There might be an extremity of emergency which might justify it, but I see none now, and in the calmest times I should much hesitate even to consider it.

We must continue to appeal to the wisdom and moderation and the well-known devotion to duty of our fellow Senators. I may submit whether there be enough of magnitude in the present question to justify a resort to the constitutional method of delay and that length of deliberation ordinarily called obstruction.

Whether we vote or do not vote, the ultimatum is appeal to the country. We must go to the country; we must go to our constituencies in either event; an appeal to the country is stronger, is more direct, on the basis of a vote, than that of abstention from voting. Responsibility for obstruction is infinitely greater than that of voting.

Mr. President, I shall be the last, here or elsewhere, to announce myself as being in favor of the legislation which was pending in the last hours of the preceding session, or to renounce my right under the rules and the Constitution to discharge my duty to the country as I see it. The argument made by Mr. Turpie against the cloture rule at that time applies to the situation that confronts the Senate now. I believed this resolution if presented to-day would not be immediately pressed for consideration, so I have had no opportunity to prepare and present to the Senate such views as I have upon this question. I could not, however, permit this vote to be taken without putting into the RECORD and reading to the Senate the views of such men as Judge Gray, the late Senators Teller and Turpie, and my one-time associate in this body, Senator Spooner.

I realize how the hysteria of the moment may be driving Senators to acquiesce here in a procedure which at another time they would resist with all their force. But so far as I am concerned I will never by my voice or vote consent to a rule which will put an end to freedom of debate in the Senate. The adoption of this rule marks a decline in the influence of the Senate in the Government. I know that the majority are determined. I believe that a majority of that majority are in this matter yielding their judgments, and that the time will come when the men who are now clamoring for this change and who by their votes are imposing cloture upon the Senate will see that rule invoked to deprive them and their States of what they deem their rights. I can not prevent the adoption of this rule, so I am content at his time to protest and vote against it.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there be objection, the Secretary will call the roll, the absence of a quorum being suggested. The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will proceed to call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hollis	Martin	Smith, Ga.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on the resolution offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. SMITH of Georgia and Mr. JAMES called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The SECRETARY proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when Mr. BANKHEAD's name was called). My colleague [Mr. BANKHEAD] is unavoidably absent from the Chamber, and also absent from the city. He has requested me to say that if he were present he would vote for the pending measure.

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. BORAH's name was called). I have been requested to announce the unavoidable absence from the Chamber of the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. Were he present he would vote "yea."

Mr. MARTIN (when Mr. CULBERSON's name was called). The senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] is unavoidably absent. I have been requested to announce that if present he would vote for this resolution.

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. FERNALD's name was called). I have been requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD]. If he were present he would vote "yea." He is paired with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when Mr. GOFF's name was called). I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness. If he were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. JAMES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], who is absent; but I am informed by his colleague that he would vote as I shall vote. I therefore vote "yea."

While I am on my feet I desire to state that the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] is absent because of illness, and that if present he would vote "yea" on this measure, as he would have voted in favor of the armed neutrality bill had be been present.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], who is absent; but I understand that he would vote "yea" if he were present. Therefore I vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). My colleague [Mr. SMITH] is absent from the city. He is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. REED (after having voted in the affirmative). Mr. President, I ask to be permitted to make a statement.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to state that I have just been informed that my colleague would have voted "yea" were he present.

Mr. REED. In order that I may be right in the RECORD, I wish to state that my pair with the Senator from Michigan is a sort of conditional one, by which, when either of us leaves the city, he shall notify the other. I had no notice of the Senator from Michigan being absent from the city. However, under the announcement just made by his colleague, I will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. MYERS (when Mr. WALSH's name was called). My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily absent from the city. If my colleague were here, I feel sure that he would vote "yea."

Mr. LODGE (when Mr. WEEKS's name was called). My colleague [Mr. WEEKS] is absent. I desire to say that if present he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. Were he present he would vote "yea." I have also been requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. OVERMAN. I have been requested to announce that the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] is unavoidably absent and has a general pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. If he were present the senior Senator from South Carolina would vote "yea."

Mr. REED. I desire to announce the fact that the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is still confined to his room and therefore has been unable to be in attendance.

Mr. PITTMAN. The senior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] is absent by reason of illness. If he were present he would vote "yea."

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—LYDIA A. MUMA.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS, it was—

Ordered, That the papers accompanying S. 7158, granting a pension to Lydia A. Muma, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

PROTECTION OF FOREIGN COMMERCE.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I tender a resolution and ask to have it lie upon the table. I purpose addressing the Senate later upon the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The resolution (S. Res. 6) is as follows:

Be it resolved by the United States Senate, That it is the sense of the Senate that the President of the United States has, by virtue of the power of his office under the Constitution and laws of the United States, the right to protect commerce destined from the United States to foreign nations, to the same extent that he has to protect interstate commerce between the States and in the navigable waters of the United States.

Be it resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that this power is not derived nor necessarily related to any of the provisions of the Constitution or laws that have to do with declaring war but is derived from the power vested in the President as head civil officer of the United States Government to execute those provisions of the Constitution and laws which relate to the fostering of commerce between the United States and foreign nations.

Be it resolved, That to secure proper protection of commerce between nations, the President of the United States has the power to protect commerce destined to foreign countries by all the means he has the right to employ for the protection of commerce between the States.

MEMORIALS.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, yesterday, by unanimous consent, I presented several memorials to Congress from the Legislature of Montana and asked that they lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD, to which there was no objection. Later I asked that they be taken from the table and referred to the committee, to which my colleague [Mr. WALSH] objected, but to that only. There was no objection made to presenting them and having them printed in the RECORD; but they are not in to-day's RECORD. I suppose they were omitted by accident or misunderstanding. They are still on the table, and I ask unanimous consent that the memorials from the Legislature of Montana which I presented yesterday be printed in to-day's RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The memorials are as follows:

House joint resolution 1. (Introduced by Harbert.) A resolution memorializing Congress for an appropriation of $1,000,000 for the Flathead irrigation project for the ensuing year.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States assembled:

Whereas the Flathead irrigation project is one of the largest and most comprehensive Indian irrigation schemes ever undertaken in this country and involves the reclamation of approximately 152,000 acres of land;

Whereas homesteaders were invited by the Government to settle upon this project under promise that their lands would be irrigated, and after six years of watchful and prayerful waiting this project is now about 25 per cent completed;

Whereas the completed cost of this project will be about $7,000,000, and less than $2,000,000 has been expended to date, and all appropriations are reimbursable: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That the House of Representatives of the Fifteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, the senate concurring herein, petition the Congress of the United States for the necessary legislation that will enable the Government to grant a million-dollar appropriation for construction work on the Flathead project for the ensuing year;

Resolved further, That a copy of this memorial be forwarded by the secretary of the State of Montana to the Senate of the United States, and that a copy of this memorial be forwarded by the secretary of the State of Montana to the House of Representatives of the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy hereof be transmitted by the secretary of state of the State of Montana to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Montana, with the request that they use every effort within their power to bring about a speedy action for accomplishments of the ends and purposes herein indicated.

House joint resolution No. 2. (Introduced by Harbert.)

A resolution memorializing Congress for the passage of hydroelectric-power legislation that will enable the Government to lease power sites to private legitimate enterprises under proper rules and regulations.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States assembled:

Whereas the waterways of this State abound in water power, it being conservatively estimated that about one-tenth of the total potential water power in the United States lies within the borders of our own State, a very small proportion of which is now developed;

Whereas the development of the various Government power sites in this State by private enterprise would add millions of dollars to our tax rolls and develop the greatest national resources we have;

Whereas the members of this legislative assembly believe that our forests and coal beds should not be needlessly exploited, and the development of the Government power sites would help conserve two of our greatest natural resources;

Whereas an early development of the aforesaid water-power sites would induce manufacturing industries to operate in this State, would encourage railways to electrify their lines, and would furnish electrical energy in such abundance that our people could cheaply electrify and heat their homes: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the house of representatives of the Fifteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, the senate concurring herein, petition the Congress of the United States for the necessary legislation that will enable the Government to lease power sites to private enterprises under such rules and regulations as will safeguard the interests of the people and yield to the lessee a fair return upon the money actually invested.

Resolved further, That a copy of this memorial be forwarded by the secretary of state of Montana to the Senate of the United States, and that a copy of this memorial be forwarded by the secretary of state of Montana to the House of Representatives of the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy hereof be transmitted by the secretary of state of the State of Montana to the Senators and Representatives of the State of Montana in Congress, with the request that they use every effort within their power to bring about a speedy action for the accomplishment of the ends and purposes herein indicated.

House joint memorial No. 3 (introduced by Harbert) memorializing Congress of the United States for a biological survey of Flathead, Whitefish, and Swan Lakes.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Whereas Flathead, Whitefish, and Swan Lakes situated in this State are the three largest bodies of water outside of the forest reserves in this State; and

Whereas these lakes contain approximately 400 square miles of water surface, varying from 150 to 350 feet in depth; and

Whereas a fish hatchery is located on Flathead Lake and an effort is being made by the State to stock these bodies of water with fish both native and foreign; and to intelligently arrive at conclusions to determine the most favored species of fish for commercial food purposes, it is necessary to ascertain the nature of animal, shell, and plant life on the bottoms of these respective lakes: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That we, your memorialists, the fifteenth legislative session of the State of Montana, do earnestly petition the Congress of the United States for a biological survey of the aforesaid waters for the purpose hereinbefore mentioned; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state be, and he is hereby, instructed to forthwith transmit copies of this memorial, properly authenticated, to the honorable Secretary of the Interior, and to our Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Montana.

House joint resolution No. 4. (Introduced by Harbert.)

A resolution memorializing Congress for the passage of an appropriation of $10,000 to dredge Polson Bay, on Flathead Lake, of this State.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States assembled:

Whereas Flathead Lake is one of the largest inland bodies of fresh water outside of the Great Lakes in the United States and contains approximately 360 square miles of water surface;

Whereas Flathead Lake is tapped on the north by the Great Northern Railway Co. and on the south by the Northern Pacific Railway Co., and the intervening space of 35 miles is water transportation;

Whereas Flathead Lake is on the park-to-park route and thousands of tourists each season journey back and forth across the lake, also hundreds of tons of freight are yearly transported across its waters;

Whereas the water in Polson Bay during certain seasons of the year is such as to make navigation hazardous, and some of the boats are unable to get to Polson on the southern end of the lake at all: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Fifteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana (the Senate concurring herein), That we petition the Congress of the United States for the necessary legislation that will enable the Government to grant an appropriation of $10,000 to dredge a channel and build a breakwater in Polson Bay for the reasons hereinbefore stated;

Resolved further, That a copy of this memorial be forwarded by the secretary of state of Montana to the Senate of the United States; and that a copy of this memorial be forwarded by the secretary of the State of Montana to the House of Representatives of the United States; and be it further

Senate joint memorial 1. (Introduced by Larson.)

Petition to Congress to enact a law admitting to citizenship one George Washington Taylor, formerly known as Sing On, born within the Empire of China.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress of the United States assembled:

Whereas one George Washington Taylor, born within the Chinese Empire, and at the age of 13 years, in the year 1873, emigrated to the United States and to the Territory of Montana, where he has resided for 44 years; first residing at the city of Helena, where he earned his own living and attended the public schools, and speaks and writes the English language, and afterwards residing in the counties of Chouteau and Teton; and

Whereas the Eleventh Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Montana, in the year 1879, at the special instance and request of the said George Washington Taylor, and out of respect for his individual worth and character, changed, by legislative act, his name which was at said time Sing On, to the name George Taylor; and

Whereas said Taylor out of respect and admiration of Gen. George Washington, the first President of the United States, and known as the Father of His County, thereafter inserted in his name the name of "Washington," and has ever since been known as and has transacted his business as George Washington Taylor; and

Whereas said George Washington Taylor was married in 1890 to Lena Bloom, a white woman of Swedish nativity, and there has been born unto said Taylor and his said wife, beginning with October, 1895, seven children, four boys and three girls, all of whom have been or are being educated in the public schools of the State of Montana, and who bear Christian names. The oldest son, Albert Henry Taylor, is of age, and has become a member of the National Guard of Montana, and has served as such for a number of years; in June, 1916, he was mustered into the service of the United States and served on the Mexican border with the Second Montana Regiment, and still remains a member of Company D of said regiment, being a sergeant thereof; and

Whereas the said George Washington Taylor is and has always been a law-abiding, honorable, intelligent, and upright man and is honored and held in great respect by all his neighbors and acquaintances; is devoted to the principles of the Constitution and Government of the United States, is opposed to anarchy and polygamy, and is wedded to this country, its people and institutions, and by virtue of his thrift, fair dealings, industry, and integrity has become the owner of large farming lands (480 acres) and other large interests in Teton, his home county, is a heavy taxpayer, and an enterprising member of society, bearing a high character and honorable name; and

Whereas Taylor has long and earnestly desired to become a citizen of the United States, his adopted country, and that all the privileges and respect of citizenship may be enjoyed by him during his declining years, and that his last resting place may be under a flag which he may call his own, and that whatever rights may follow his becoming naturalized may accrue to his children; and

Whereas he possesses all the qualifications to entitle him to become a citizen, save his nativity (the acts of Congress forbidding): Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, The House concurring, we the Fifteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, do hereby petition and earnestly pray the honorable Congress of the United States for the passage of special legislation, authorizing the naturalization of the said George Washington Taylor, and that upon his application to any court having jurisdiction to naturalize aliens, said court upon due proofs of good moral character, residence, and the other qualifications required before being naturalized, save and except his nativity admit forthwith said George Washington Taylor to full citizenship of the United States; and it is further

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be forwarded by the secretary of state of the State of Montana to the Senate of the United States, and that copies of this memorial be forwarded by the secretary of state of the State of Montana to the House of Representatives of the United States, and that copies thereof be transmitted by the secretary of state of the State of Montana to the Senators and Represenatives in Congress of the State of Montana, with the request that they use every effort within their power to bring about a speedy action for the accomplishment of the ends and purposes herein indicated.

"Whereas there exists in our State an urgent need for the opportunity of developing its water power as an aid to its industrial growth and progress; and

"Whereas there are situate within the State of Montana many large streams and natural power sites of magnitude and great potential possibilities, the early development of which, for the production of dydroelectric energy and other kindred uses, depends entirely, in large measure, in the attitude and action of the National Congress in connection therewith: Now, therefore be it

"Resolved, That we, the House of Representatives of the State of Montana, respectfully ask, in connection with the water-power bill now under consideration in the Senate of the United States, for immediate legislation such as will permit, fully and freely, the development of water power in the streams and power sites on the public lands and on the Indian reservations in Montana, under such rules and regulations as the Congress of the United States may prescribe.

Senate joint resolution No. 3. (Introduced by Hogan.)

Resolution relating to increase in compensation in the Federal Mail Service.

Whereas the employees in the Federal Mail Service have made application to the Congress of the United States for an increase in compensation; and

Whereas the present schedule of compensation was fixed at a time when the average wage schedule of the industries of the Nation was much below the present standard; and

Whereas the very great increase in the cost of living makes it impossible for many of the employees of the Mail Service to properly support themselves and families; and

Whereas it is unseemly and unjust that the employees of the most progressive and greatest Nation in the world should not participate in the general prosperity of the country; and

Whereas there is now pending before the Congress of the United States a bill, the purpose of which is to increase the compensation of said employees: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, That the Congress of the United States be urged to enact such laws as may be necessary to secure to said employees a fair measure of compensation; and be it further

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress of the United States of America:

Your memorialists, the members of the Fifteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, the senate and house concurring, respectfully represent—

Whereas it appears that a majority of the people of the United States are in favor of prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors for use as a beverage; and,

House joint memorial No. 2. (Introduced by Kemmis.)

A resolution memorializing Congress to relinquish and cease to exercise its jurisdiction over the Missouri and Yellowstone Rivers in the State of Montana.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Whereas the Missouri and Yellowstone Rivers in the State of Montana have ceased to be used for interstate commerce; and

Whereas said streams could not be made navigable between Montana and North Dakota without the expenditure of large sums of money, the amount of which would be wholly disproportionate to any benefit or advantage which could be derived from the use of said streams for the purpose of navigation; and

Whereas railroads now extend between all points on said rivers in and outside of the State of Montana, between which commerce is or can be carried on by means of such railroads; and

Whereas the welfare of the people of Montana and the proper development of said State require that the construction of bridges, the diversion of water from said streams for the purpose of irrigation, and the operation of ferries over and across said rivers should be under the supervision, control, and jurisdiction of said State; and

Whereas no useful purpose can be subserved by Congress continuing to exercise jurisdiction over said rivers in the State of Montana: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Fifteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana (the senate concurring therein), That we do hereby petition the Congress of the United States that it relinquish and cease to exercise its jurisdiction over said rivers in the State of Montana; and

Resolved further, That a copy of this memorial be forwarded by the secretary of state of the State of Montana to the Senate of the United States; and that a copy of this memorial be forwarded by the secretary of state of the State of Montana to the House of Representatives of the United States: And be it further

Resolved, That a copy hereof be transmitted by the secretary of state of the State of Montana to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Montana, with the request that they use every effort within their power to bring about a speedy action for the ends and purposes herein indicated.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 9, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou dost make us great through the service that we render to our fellow men. Thou dost make us God-like in our greatness as we draw inspiration and power from Thee in our service. Forbid that we shall fall short of the highest achievements of life by forgetfulness of God. Without Thee we fall short of our highest reach either of service or character. Forbid that in this life which we have from Thee that any of us should fail to measure its profound depths or to ascend to its glorious heights through the lure of any earthly good. To-day equip us for the duties that are before us, and help us at its close to come to the end with a comfortable satisfaction that Thou has guided our lives. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CONVENING OF CONGRESS.

Mr. McLEAN. I ask unanimous consent for the introduction of the following resolution, which I ask may be read and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will, without objection, read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 8) was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Whereas important measures, vital to the honor and safety of the Nation, demand the immediate attention of the Congress: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the Congress should be convened in extraordinary session at a date not later than the 26th day of the present month.

NEWS-PRINT-PAPER INDUSTRY.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire to present a resolution for printing the report of the Federal Trade Commission in response to Senate resolution, April 24, 1916, relative to an investigation of the news-print-paper industry in the United States. It is not a very long document and there is great demand for it. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 7), as follows:

Resolved, That the report of the Federal Trade Commission submitted in response to a Senate resolution of April 24, 1916, relative to an investigation of the news-print-paper industry in the United States be printed as a Senate document, and that 5,000 additional copies be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not hear what the request was.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is a report of the Federal Trade Commission in response to a Senate resolution regarding an inquiry as to the news print paper industry. It is not a very long report. The resolution provides for printing the report as a Senate document. There is quite a demand for it.

Mr. SMOOT. It is in answer to the resolution passed at the first session of the last Congress?

Mr. FLETCHER. It is in answer to that resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PROTECTION OF FOREIGN COMMERCE.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I merely rise to say that I gave notice and had intended to address the Senate to-day upon the resolution I introduced yesterday touching the executive power of the President. I am requested this morning by the able Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], the chairman of the Committee on Committees, to forego that the committee may have as much time as possible to arrange the general committees of the Senate. I have gladly acceded to the request with the understanding that I may have the liberty of taking the floor on Monday instead of to-day.

MEMORIALS.

Mr. NELSON. I present a resolution adopted by the Minnesota Editorial Association, which I ask may be read.

There being no objection the resolution was read, as follows:

MINNESOTA EDITORIAL ASSOCIATION,

Whereas a grave international crisis exists, involving the relations of the United States and other world powers, we, the members of the Minnesota Editorial Association, in convention assembled, affirm our loyalty to our Government and pledge our undivided support to the President and Congress in defense of American institutions, and the protection of American rights and lives on land or sea; and

Be it resolved further, That we exert our influence in the promotion of national patriotism and loyalty among our people.

H. M. WHEELOCK,
President Minnesota Editorial Association.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I present a resolution adopted by the Texas State Senate, which I ask may be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Simple resolution 97. (By Harley.)

Whereas the Government of the United States has again resumed friendly relations with the Government of Mexico and has designated an ambassador to said Government; and

Whereas there are in the State of Texas a number of distinguished and worthy citizens of our sister Republic, as well as a number of American citizens, who have large property holdings in Mexico: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we request our State Department at Washington to request our ambassador in the City of Mexico to continue to use his good offices in behalf of these unfortunate people, to the end that their property rights in Mexico may be respected and preserved by the Government of Mexico; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the State Department at Washington and to each of our Senators and Representatives at Washington.

February 23, 1917; read and adopted.

JOHN D. MCCALL,
Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. WEEKS. I present resolutions adopted by the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, which I ask may be incorporated in the RECORD.

The resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS, 1917.

Resolutions in support of amendments to the naturalization laws of the United States.

Resolved, That the General Court of Massachusetts, believing that there is injustice both to the alien desiring to become a citizen and to the State because of the lack of interest in the Government by unnaturalized aliens growing out of the present difficulty in securing naturalization, respectfully petitions the Congress of the United States to amend the law relating thereto with a view to making it less expensive to the alien to become a citizen, particularly by providing night sessions of naturalization courts.

Resolved, That certified copies of these resolutions be sent by the secretary of the Commonwealth to the President of the United States, to the presiding officers of both branches of Congress, and to the Senators and Representatives from Massachusetts.

In house of representatives, adopted, February 16, 1917.
In senate, adopted, in concurrence, February 21, 1917.

Whereas under the present rules and regulations of the United States Department of Agriculture, in respect to the shooting of migratory birds, it is illegal to hunt before sunrise or after sunset; and

Whereas such rules and regulations are unjust to the inhabitants of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts in that they do not permit the shooting of birds between the hours of one hour before sunrise and one hour after sunset: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Massachusetts are hereby requested to take early and concerted action to bring before the United States Department of Agriculture the present injustice of the rules and regulations of that department as above specified; and

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions, attested by the secretary of the Commonwealth, be sent to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Massachusetts.

In house of representatives, adopted February 15, 1917.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. MARTIN. The Committee on Committees on both sides of the Chamber are at work endeavoring to perfect the committees of the Senate. In order that they may have an opportunity to dispatch that work as rapidly as possible, I move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock noon Monday.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, March 12, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE.

MONDAY, March 12, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we call upon Thy name that we may reconcile the purposes and motives we have for our Nation with Thy revealed will. We would not go forward in the establishment of our commerce, we would not move forward in the defense of our national honor, unless it is to the call of God and in harmony with Thy purpose concerning us. Thou art the God of nations, and we put ourselves in Thy hands that we may work out a destiny that will redound to the honor and glory of Thy name. To this end do Thou lead us now and always. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Vice President being absent, the President pro tempore assumed the chair.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

Several messages, in writing, from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries.

The resolution was agreed to.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION BY COMMITTEE ON RULES.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I submit the following resolution and ask that it may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution submitted by the Senator from Nevada.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 9), as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules investigate the question as to the efficiency of the present committee and legislative system of the Senate and report its recommendations.

Resolved further, That the Committee on Rules investigate the question as to superfluous committees of the Senate and report its recommendations regarding them, as well as the allowance of clerical aid which should be made to Senators who have not committee chairmanships.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to make a few words of comment upon the resolution.

Mr. REED. The resolution will go over under the rule until to-morrow?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Surely.

Mr. REED. The only reason why I made the inquiry is that we are going into executive session for the transaction of executive business and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] who came here this morning prepared to deliver an address has, I understand, waived that right in order that the Senate might proceed at once to executive business. It would seem almost discourteous to ask him to waive a prepared speech and then go on with the transaction of general business.

Mr. LEWIS. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. REED. Certainly. The Senator will pardon me for anticipating him.

Mr. LEWIS. If the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Nevada will indulge me, I wish to state that it was my desire to address myself to my resolution now lying upon the table, asserting the Executive power touching the placing of guns upon ships for the protection of international commerce. It was my intention to address the Senate this morning as to that power. I am, as the able Senator from Missouri says, informed and that through the chairman of the Committee on Committees, Chairman MARTIN, that important executive matters need attention this morning, that such is very urgent, and in view of that urgency I am asked to defer addressing the Senate at this time. Because of that request and that exigency, of course I yield for the present, allowing the matter to go over until a more convenient time. Therefore I will not stand in the way of the necessities of the occasion.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, my statement will take only a few moments, and, unless the Senator from Virginia is insistent, I will prefer to make it now; otherwise I will suit the convenience of the Senate. I propose to ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules for its report.

I wish to say simply in connection with the resolution that it must be evident to this body of most competent men that the methods employed by the Senate for the consideration of public business are not the most competent methods and are not such as to secure economy of time. When I first entered Congress, some 24 years ago, the length of the average session was about six months. Now we are almost in continuous session, and during the last Congress 15,000 bills were introduced. I think it must be perfectly evident to every Senator that this body should apply itself to the study of the rules of efficiency, which have been in the near past and are now being applied to almost every vocation. It is with a view to securing the judgment of the Committee on Rules upon the subject that I ask for this inquiry in the hope that that committee, if it needs an appropriation with a view to making its investigation thorough and complete, will ask it of this body, and in the hope that a thorough investigation through experts, publicists, and others, will be made of various legislative systems both in the States and in other governments with a view to securing the highest efficiency in our own.

With reference to the superfluous committees, I wish to state that doubtless these committees, though apparently formed for the purpose of providing chairmanships, really originated in some definite public purpose. For instance, I heard read this morning the list of the members of the Committee on the Conservation of Natural Resources. I know that when that committee was organized it was with the expectation that it would be an active committee, and that it would do a most important work upon a subject that was attracting the wide attention of the public. We all know that, as a matter of fact, the subjects which would come under the jurisdiction of that committee had been previously intrusted to other standing committees of the Senate, and thus, as a matter of fact, no legislation practically has come from that committee, all conservation legislation coming from the standing committees to which the jurisdiction of the particular subject, such as public lands, mines, forests, and waterways belongs. So it is with many other committees which are assigned either to majority Members, who have no active committee chairmanships, or to minority Members. They are organized for some beneficial purpose, but they have become unnecessary and superfluous.

Now, I wish to say that this is not suggested in any spirit of economy, so far as the minority Members are concerned. I realize the fact that the minority Members have just as important public duties as have the majority Members, and that they are entitled to just as much clerical aid. I do not think the standard of pay which has been allowed is sufficient. I think that every minority Senator ought to have a clerk at $2,400 a year, a clerk at $2,000 a year, and another at $1,500 a year; that at least that standard ought to be adopted.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not wish to prolong the discussion.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I merely wish to suggest to the Senator that a special committee was appointed at the last session to look into this matter and to report to the Senate.

Mr. NEWLANDS. My resolution calls for the Committee on Rules to consider the matter. I hope that committee will be assigned this duty.

Mr. President, the duties of Senators have been constantly enlarging. The Senators, I imagine, from some States have as large a correspondence as all the Members of the House of Representatives from the State.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I hope that the Senator will not compel me to call for the regular order, but I certainly shall have to do so if the Senator takes very much longer.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I shall be through in another sentence.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I see no need of impatience regarding matters of this kind. This is an important matter.

Mr. President, I believe that defects exist with reference to our committee system, which devolves upon certain Members most arduous committee duties upon important committees, and that the result is that they can not attend to all their duties. I know that in the case of the committee of which I am chairman, which has a most important jurisdiction—that of interstate commerce—it has been during the last session exceedingly difficult to get a quorum, and that when we would secure a quorum, members would be obliged to leave with a view to attending to other important committee duties. It seems to me that the Committee on Rules ought to look into this and that the questions raised by this resolution are among the most important that relate to the efficient administration of the business of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolution of the Senator from Nevada will be referred to the Committee on Rules and printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. NELSON. I present a resolution adopted by the House of Representatives of the Legislature of Minnesota, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas certain Senators of the United States have by conducting a filibuster prevented the enactment of an "armed-neutrality" law, by which law it was sought to give the President power to protect the neutrality of the Nation by armed force; and

Whereas said Senators have by such filibuster caused the opinion to prevail abroad that the country and its Government refuse to support the administration; and

Whereas the prevalence of such opinion abroad may make the task of the President of maintaining peace more difficult: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Minnesota, That the Representatives and Senators of the State in the Congress of the United States be urged henceforth to take such steps as will prove to the nations of the world that Americans are unanimous in supporting the President in his efforts to protect the lives of citizens on land and sea, and to maintain the honor and integrity of the Republic.

Which was read and adopted March 8, 1917.

OSCAR ARNESON,
Chief Clerk House of Representatives.

Mr. LODGE. I present resolutions of the New England Shoe and Leather Finders' Association, of Boston; the American Order of Fraternal Helpers, of Boston; and of sundry citizens of Topsfield and Amherst, all in the State of Massachusetts, in favor of the full protection of American rights, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions adopted by the New England Leather & Shoe Finders' Association at its annual convention held at the Quincy House, Boston, Mass., March 8, 1917.

Whereas the very life of our country is endangered by the international crisis with which it is confronted, our commerce is injured, and our rights upon the high seas ignored; and

Whereas our country is menaced by the unfriendly acts and intrigues of a hitherto friendly nation: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the New England Leather & Shoe Finders' Association in convention assembled hereby heartily indorse the action of the President in this crisis and pledge to him its loyal support.

It earnestly commends those Senators and Congressmen who supported the President in his efforts to secure protective legislation, but it condemns in unmeasured terms the outrageous, un-American and unpatriotic action of those 12 Senators who endeavored to prevent legislation so vital to the protection of our land; and be it further

Resolved, That our association pledge its hearty cooperation to the governors and legislatures of each of our New England States and to the Massachusetts Committee on Public Safety and will earnestly support and assist them as far as able in any measure which they deem necessary and advisable to take for the preservation of our liberty and rights, for the safeguarding of our flag and country and for the protection of our people and the Republic.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the President, to the New England Senators and Congressmen at Washington, to each of the New England governors, and to the chairman of the Massachusetts Committee on Public Safety.

AMERICAN ORDER OF FRATERNAL HELPERS,
Boston, Mass., March 6, 1917.

The Supreme Lodge of the American Order of Fraternal Helpers in annual meeting assembled desires to give expression to the indignation of its members at the action of a small coterie of small Senators who, by the perversion of a Senate rule and the application of parliamentary trickery, endeavored to defeat the purpose of our President, our Congress, and our people to maintain the rights of American ships and safeguard the lives of American citizens:

Resolved, That we stand firmly in support of the President of our country in all his efforts to maintain its honor and protect its rights, and that for this purpose we hereby pledge him our services in any capacity in which they may be utilized.

Resolved, That a copy hereof be mailed to President Wilson.

JOS. T. INGALLS,
Supreme President.

Attest:

PATRICK W. CURRY,
Supreme Secretary.

The above was adopted by unanimous vote.

Resolutions unanimously adopted at the annual town meeting in Topsfield, Mass., March 5, 1917.

As the descendants and successors of the men of one of the group of little communities surrounding Salem Bay, which, during the Revolutionary War and the early days of the Republic, sent out innumerable armed ships to defend the American rights on the high seas, it is hereby

Resolved, That we, the citizens of Topsfield, indorse the action of the President of the United States in dismissing the German ambassador.

Resolved, That we urge the immediate calling of an extra session of Congress and the use of the full power of the Nation in defense of American rights, American lives, and American honor on the high seas.

Resolved, That we pledge our loyalty and our support to the President for this purpose.

Voted that these resolutions be adopted and that the moderator now appoint a committee of three to transmit them to the President, the two Senators from Massachusetts, the Congressman of this district, and to the senator and representative of this district in the Massachusetts Legislature, with an appropriate letter.

SIR: At the annual meeting of the voters of this town, held March 5, 1917, it was unanimously voted to adopt the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the voters of Amherst, Mass., assembled, unanimously indorse the President of the United States in upholding the honor and integrity of the Nation in the present crisis, and that the moderator and the town clerk be directed to forward a copy of this vote to the president of the United States and to the Senators from Massachusetts and to the Representative in Congress from this district."

Respectfully submitted.

THOS. W. SMITH, Town Clerk.

NORTH HANOVER, Mass., March 5, 1917.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
United States Senate.

Greeting:

Resolved, That we, the citizens of the town of Hanover, Mass., assembled at our annual town meeting, indorse the efforts of the President of the United States to safeguard the lives and rights of our Nation. We condemn the action of the small minority in the Senate in blocking needed legislation as being unpatriotic, undemocratic, and dangerous to our national welfare.

Voted: That the town of Hanover, Mass., indorse the above resolutions, and that a copy be sent to the President of the United States and a copy to United States Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE.

BERNARD L. STETSON, Town Clerk.

Mr. LODGE. I also present resolutions of the Central Labor Union of Fall River and of sundry citizens of Winchester, in the State of Massachusetts, in support of the President in his efforts to protect the lives and rights of American citizens, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FALL RIVER, MASS., March 4, 1917.

Whereas the Imperial German Government, by proclaiming a barred zone about the coasts of the British Isles, France, and the coasts of Europe and Africa bordering on the Mediterranean Sea, into which all vessels enter at peril of destruction, contrary to all recognized international rights; and

Whereas American ships have been destroyed and are now imperiled by the activities of submarine commanders under direction of the Imperial German Government, without right and without justification; and

Whereas the lives of American citizens have been sacrificed by the acts of the commanders of submarines acting under instructions of the Imperial German Government, which disclaims liability or blame, contrary to all law and morality: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Central Labor Union of Fall River, Mass., representing the body of organized labor in the city, does here and now pledge its support to the President of the United States in the measures that are made necessary by the aggressions of the Imperial German Government; and be it further

Resolved, That the extent of this support be not limited to the simple arming of merchant vessels and their convoyance by ships of war, but shall extend to the use of other instrumentalities that may be demanded by the exigencies of the situation; and be it further

Resolved, That the said Central Labor Union do hereby call upon Senator WEEKS and Senator LODGE and Congressman WILLIAM S. GREENE to support the President of the United States to the extent of their powers in maintaining the sovereign right of freedom to traverse the oceans without let or hindrance by the shipping of the United States of America.

To this end therefore, witness our hands and the seal of the Fall River Central Labor Union this 4th day of March, A. D. 1917.

Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At the annual town meeting of the town of Winchester, Mass., held on March 5, 1917, the following resolution was adopted:

"Whereas the German Imperial Government has, as the President said, forbidden our people the exercise 'of their peaceful and legitimate errands on the high seas'; and

"Whereas, in consequence, the President of the United States has severed diplomatic relations with Germany: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the citizens of the town of Winchester, in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, in the town meeting assembled, this 5th day of March, 1917—

"First. That they commend the President for his uncompromising stand in severing diplomatic relations;

"Second. That they regard with disgust and indignation the action of 11 Senators of the United States in preventing the passage by an overwhelming majority of the Members of the two Houses of the Congress of an act designed to protect the citizens of the United States and to arm their ships against the unlawful and barbarous aggressions of the German Imperial Government;

"Third. That they rely upon the President at once to protect American citizens and American ships in their acknowledged rights upon the high seas;

"Fourth. That they urge upon the President the necessity of making immediate preparations against the contingencies of war; and

"Fifth. That, while they desire peace, they desire peace only with honor, and call upon the President to regain at this time the honor of the American people."

Attest:

MABEL W. STINSON,
Assistant Town Clerk.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented petitions of the Business Men's Club of Mason, the Mason County Highway League, and the Commercial Club of Crockett, all in the State of Texas, praying for the adoption of a system of national highways, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. PITTMAN obtained the floor.

Mr. SHIELDS. Will the Senator from Nevada yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. PITTMAN. I will inquire of the Senator if what he has in mind will lead to debate?

Mr. SHIELDS. No; I merely desire to ask to have certain resolutions printed in the RECORD.

Mr. PITTMAN. Very well, I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHIELDS. I present resolutions adopted by the Business Men's Club of Memphis, Tenn., on the subject of armed neutrality and preparedness. The resolutions have been sent to me with the request that I present them to the Senate, and I ask that they be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the resolutions will be printed in the RECORD.

The resolutions are as follows:

The Business Men's Club Chamber of Commerce in meeting assembled—

First. Resolves, That in view of the grave crisis presented by our ships being denied the freedom of the seas in their peaceful pursuit of commerce, we believe it the duty of all citizens to uphold the President in his recommendation that the Government of our country furnish arms and gunners to our merchant ships, that attacks upon them of an unlawful and inhuman character may be repelled.

Second. Resolved further, That we pledge ourselves not only to support the President in this matter in every way, but in every effort to uphold the honor and dignity of the United States and protect the lives and rights of American citizens on every land and sea.

Third. Resolved further, That we call upon Congress to give the President every power and means asked for by him to protect and assert our rights.

Fourth. Resolved further, That we indorse the principle of universal military training and service for all men prior to their twenty-first birthday, and we call on our Senators and Congressmen to support, vote, and work for the passage of a bill in Congress to provide for and require such service and training; and

Fifth. Resolved further, That the chairman of this meeting appoint a committee of 10 to have prepared and circulated petitions to be signed by voters in this and surrounding territory indorsing this position and urging the President and Congress to have such a law passed.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. PITTMAN. I will ask the Senator what is his desire?

Mr. HUSTING. I desire to present a number of petitions and ask to have them printed in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, in regard to those petitions, are they all to be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. HUSTING. I do not desire to have the names printed, but the body of the petitions only, all of which are short.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Do they relate to different matters?

Mr. HUSTING. They all relate to preparedness and the war proposition.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Are they all practically alike? Would not the printing of one of them be sufficient?

Mr. HUSTING. They are not alike.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It seems to me, if we are going to print all these petitions in the RECORD, and keep it up during the session of Congress——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I shall not object, but it seems to me we ought not to print all such petitions in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Wisconsin will be complied with.

The petitions referred to are as follows:

We, the undersigned members of the faculty of the University of Wisconsin, desire to express our strong support of the course of the President of the United States in whatever steps he may deem necessary for defense of the rights of humanity and for the protection of the lives and property of American citizens when following their lawful pursuits.

We urge the Government of the United States to afford immediate and adequate protection to all American ships engaged in European trade, that our rights to trade and to travel on the high seas may be unabridged.

We urge the President and the Government of the United States in the present crisis to omit no act necessary for the prompt and vigorous defense of American rights and American security against all the assaults of the Imperial German Government.

WAUSAU, WIS., February 18, 1917.

HON. PAUL O. HUSTING,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

To the President and Representatives in Congress and Senate of the United States of America:

Authorized thereto and representing more than 600 citizens of the United States, residing at Wausau, Wis., we most earnestly protest against participating in or entering upon a condition of warfare with any foreign nation. Neither the honor of our country nor the welfare of its people demand such savage recourse, but, on the contrary, will be best subserved by the condition of peace.

We most respectfully petition, therefore, that peace be maintained.

WAUSAU BRANCH OF GERMAN-AMERICAN ALLIANCE.

INTERNATIONAL UNION OF THE UNITED BREWERY WORKMEN OF AMERICA,
Milwaukee, Wis., February 13, 1917.

Mr. PAUL O. HUSTING.

DEAR SIR:

Whereas there is great danger that our country also will be swept into the bloody abyss that is threatening civilization; and

Whereas there is no other reason why we should fight than that to safeguard the transportation of munitions and war material and grain to the Allies; and

Whereas the workingmen of this country must refuse to kill and be killed in order to bring more blood-covered billions to the ruling class of this country: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the United Brewery Workers' Unions of Milwaukee, protest against a declaration of war on any country as a crime against humanity; and be it

Resolved, That we demand that our Government keep Americans off belligerent ships or ships carrying contraband of war; and be it also

Resolved, That our Government refuse clearance to all vessels carrying munition, war material, food, or contraband to Europe; and, finally, be it

Resolved, That a copy of each of these resolutions be sent to the President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the two Senators from the State of Wisconsin, the two Congressmen from Milwaukee, and to the daily press.

TIGERTON, SHAWANO COUNTY, WIS.,
February 23, 1917.

HON. PAUL O. HUSTING,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We, the undersigned citizens of this community, do herewith solemnly urge you to use your every effort to keep this country out of the European war.

In making this request we voice the view of every citizen of this community.

To Hon. J. J. ESCH, Representative in the Congress of the United States, and Hon. R. M. LA FOLLETTE and Hon. PAUL HUSTING, United States Senators.

DEAR SIRS: Exercising our uninvadable right as American citizens to inform our Representatives of the sentiments and convictions held by those whom they are to represent in national affairs—

1. We, the members of the German Methodist Episcopal Church of La Crosse, Wis., comprising a constituency of 500 persons or more, do hereby solemnly and most emphatically protest against our nation entering, on either side, into the present European struggle.

2. As the followers of the Prince of Peace and the true exponents of the religion of the Son of God, we are opposed to wars among nations. Force never permanently settled anything. No great war has ever been waged with less justification and mere frivolous pretext than the present gigantic struggle. It is the most stupid and senseless slaughter humanity has ever witnessed, and for us, as the "American Nation" to enter into the deadly combat at the present time would surely mean the extermination and maiming of the manhood of the white race, and would therefore be an inexcusable crime against mankind.

3. The German submarine warfare does not threaten our national integrity or independence, nor our national dignity and honor, for it is not aimed primarily at the property and lives of the citizens of the United States, it will only strike those classes that have made huge profits out of the greatest human slaughter history ever will record and hurt those individuals who, in "Shylock" fashion, are taking away the "daily bread" from our own people and selling it at exorbitant prices to the armies of the belligerents or are withholding the necessaries of life from the market and thereby exert "war prices" from the consumer at home.

4. We are deeply convinced that if the people of the United States could register their will in this matter of "going to war or not" that they would, by an overwhelming majority, go on record against entering into a war where we have nothing at stake, certainly nothing to gain, but possibly much to lose in precious lives of our young manhood and fabulous sums of money.

We urge upon you to do all in your power to keep our nation out of the present "world war."

5. Furthermore, since the "high cost of living" makes it impossible for millions of honest toilers to earn a livelihood for themselves and their families, and since food riots are daily occurrences throughout our country, we do request you most earnestly to employ all legitimate means and to use your best endeavors to put an immediate and effective embargo upon all food exportation so that millions of our own citizens may be saved from hunger and starvation.

We expect you to stand by the slogan, "America first," and by the people who have elected you so we may have in reality a government "of the people, by the people, and for the people."

Yours, very sincerely,

Rev. J. L. PANZLAU.

These resolutions were unanimously adopted by a rising vote February 25, 1917, La Crosse, Wis.

PORT WASHINGTON, WIS., February 26, 1917.

HON. PAUL O. HUSTING,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We, American citizens, acting within the duties imposed upon us by the Constitution of the United States to serve our country at all times, and convinced that the interests of our country will be jeopardized by war, but will be served by a continuance of peaceful relations with all foreign countries, both neutrals and belligerents—

Do hereby earnestly protest against any measure or resolution of Congress which would lead to or result in war over the injury of, or death to, any American who persists in jeopardizing the peace of the United States by traveling as passenger or seaman on American or neutral ship carrying contraband of war or traveling on a ship of belligerent-nation registry; and

Do hereby earnestly petition you to voice our protest against any use of the United States Army and Navy for the protection of Americans who persist in this dangerous travel, and to vote against any proposal to so use our Army and Navy, or to so go to war.

MILWAUKEE, February 26, 1917.

Hon. E. L. HUSTING,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The undersigned, citizens of the State of Wisconsin, residing in the city of Milwaukee, do urgently request you to support and vote for Senate bill 1695, reported by Senator CHAMBERLAIN February 10, 1917, providing for compulsory military and naval training.

A CALL TO AMERICANS TO ASSURE THE PRESIDENT THAT HE WILL RECEIVE THE UNITED SUPPORT OF THE AMERICAN PEOPLE IN TAKING EFFECTIVE ACTION TO UPHOLD AMERICAN RIGHTS AND DEFEND THE NATIONAL HONOR.

Many citizens who are intensely convinced that the present state of the German submarine question demands prompt and vigorous action in defense of American rights hesitate to press their views for fear of embarrassing the President. No such consideration stays the hand of those who seek to paralyze any effort he may make to carry into practical effect his pledge to omit no act necessary for the protection of American ships and American citizens engaged upon lawful errands on the high seas. The clamor of extreme pacifists, and of those who from other motives are opposed to this patriotic course, makes itself insistently heard, within Congress and without. It is no longer permissible, therefore, for those to remain silent who wish to support the President in the protection of our national rights and the defense of our national honor.

Our ships and our flag are being excluded from the seas by the threat of death and destruction conveyed in Germany's declaration of war on neutral shipping. The need of the hour is to take effectual measures to safeguard our shipping and our citizens, rather than to wait for Americans to be murdered and then go to war to punish the offender. To refuse, or too long delay, such protection would be to acquiesce in the subjugation of American rights to German domination. The time has come to assure the President that he will have the overwhelming support of his fellow countrymen in taking effective measures to meet the intolerable situation with which the country is now confronted.

WILLIAM A. BANCROFT CAMP, No. 16,
UNITED SPANISH WAR VETERANS,
DEPARTMENT OF WISCONSIN,
Racine, Wis., February 21, 1917.

Whereas the recent development of over-seas conditions may possibly interfere with the rights, freedom, and privilege of our country, the United States of America, and that as citizens we consider those rights sacred and not to be violated by any foreign nation, and as the President of our country has deemed it wise and necessary to cease relations with the powers deemed guilty of such infringements of our Nation's rights and freedom, it is herewith

Resolutions adopted at a mass meeting in the city of Milwaukee, Wis., on February 27, 1917.

Whereas there is great danger that our country will be plunged into war and the manhood of our Nation destroyed in order that our manufacturers may safely transport ammunition and war material to Europe, and that our food speculators may sell our food at exorbitant prices to feed the fighting armies; and

Whereas certain mouthpieces of the munition makers declare that the dignity of the Nation and our sovereignty demand that our citizens be permitted to travel on belligerent ships, even when these ships carry ammunition and war material: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, loyal American citizens, in meeting assembled, hereby declare that to our best knowledge and belief the common people of our country are in favor of peace and against war; that the common people protest against taking away our food in order to provide for the soldiers of Europe; and that the common people of our country therefore do not want a declaration of war on any power in order to protect a blood-stained commerce; and be it further

Resolved, That we hereby declare that the dignity and sovereignty of our Nation do not demand that our citizens be protected on belligerent ships any more than that they be protected on belligerent soil; and that we therefore demand that American citizens be warned against boarding ships of belligerents except at their own risk, and that American ships be forbidden to enter the war zone; and be it also

Resolved, That the President and Congress hereby be petitioned, requested, and urged to declare a complete embargo on all food products in order to protect the necessary food supply of our own people and to prevent famine, starvation, and all concomitant evils; and finally, be it

Resolved, That a copy of each of these resolutions be sent to President Woodrow Wilson, to the two United States Senators from Wisconsin, and to the Wisconsin delegation in the National House of Representatives.

Hon. PAUL O. HUSTING,

Therefore the undersigned, citizens of said city of Viroqua, do hereby petition you that you will make representations to the Federal Government showing that it is the desire of the petitioners that a contract be entered into with said societies to reserve suitable quarters for the post office in the building to be erected on the said site.

TUESDAY, March 13, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we thank Thee for calling us into fellowship with Thyself in the service that we endeavor to render to our fellow men. We thank Thee for the assurance that Thou who dost hold all the spheres in their paths and dost note the fall of a sparrow art familiar with all the needs of Thy children. They are the flowers of Thy heart; they are the constant care of Thy thought. Thou hast called us into fellowship with Thyself in service, and our equipment for service must come from Thee. Give to us the inspiration that will make us true to the divine commission Thou hast put in our hands and hearts. For Christ's sake. Amen.

SEVERANCE OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH GERMANY.

Mr. NELSON. I present short resolutions adopted by the Plymouth Club, of the city of Minneapolis, Minn., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions.

Plymouth Club, of the city of Minneapolis, in meeting assembled, March 5, 1917, adopts the following resolutions:

"First. That the act of the Executive in severing diplomatic relations with Germany is one to be approved and commended by all who have the best interests of the United States at heart.

"Second. That the German declaration of January 31, 1917, represents an unjustified and unjustifiable attempt to destroy the freedom of the sea and to abridge the commercial liberty guaranteed to us by established law and custom; and that if the Government of the United States were to acquiesce therein such action would be resented by all good citizens as in the highest degree pusillanimous and as altogether inconsistent with the spirit and traditions of a free people.

"Third. That the President will be justified in recommending to Congress the most extreme measures that may be deemed necessary to protect life, liberty, and property; and that it is our duty and that of all loyal citizens to tender immediately to the Government all the service of which we severally and collectively are capable.

"Fourth. That while all should stand ready to volunteer, if voluntary service is called for, yet Congress in providing for our common safety should not adopt emergency measures merely, but should definitely recognize the principle that the duty of defending the Nation rests equally upon all citizens capable of service. To the end, therefore, that the burden of safeguarding the country should no longer be cast exclusively upon the loyal National Guard and upon other patriotic military and naval volunteers, Congress should be urged to exercise its constitutional power 'to raise and support armies' by establishing immediately a permanent and democratic system of defense based upon universal service and training under direct and exclusive Federal control."

A copy of these resolutions is ordered to be transmitted to the President of the United States, to Senators NELSON and KELLOGG, and to Representatives LUNDEEN and SCHALL.

H. C. RICHARDSON,
Secretary.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 14, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 14, 1917.

Rev. Richard R. Riedel, of the city of Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God and Father of us all, who hast been our hope in ages past, our hope for years to come, we thank Thee that Thy guiding hand has been constant in our Nation's history, controlling and ruling all for good. Permit these Thy servants, placed here by Thy providence, to labor and plan for the welfare of our great Republic, and may it please Thee to give them Thy grace, wisdom, and power that they may do their work and do it well. Bless, we beseech Thee, our dear country, this Senate, the President of the United States, and all in authority. For Christ's sake. Amen.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Secretary [James M. Baker] read the following communication:

PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., March 14, 1917.

To the Senate:

Being temporarily absent from the Senate, I appoint Hon. ATLEE POMERENE, a Senator from the State of Ohio, to perform the duties of the Chair during my absence.

WILLARD SAULSBURY,
President pro tempore.

Mr. POMERENE thereupon took the chair as Presiding Officer and directed the Secretary to read the Journal of the proceedings of the preceding session.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries.

SENATOR FROM WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. SIMMONS. I present a petition from Hon. W. E. Chilton asking for an investigation into the legality of the election of Hon. HOWARD SUTHERLAND as a Senator from the State of West Virginia. I ask that the petition, with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SEVERANCE OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH GERMANY.

Mr. CALDER. I present resolutions of the residents of the town of Southampton, Suffolk County, N. Y.; the Nineteenth Ward Woodrow Wilson Democratic Club of Rochester, N. Y.; the Common Council of the City of Middletown, N. Y.; and the Republican Club of the Fifteenth Assembly District of New York County, N. Y., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the voters of the town of Southampton, Suffolk County, N. Y., in a convention duly assembled for the purpose of nominating officers for such corporate body; and

Whereas the present world war has provided sufficient cause for our country to sever diplomatic relations with the Imperial Government of Germany; and

Whereas our greater destiny and position before the nations of the world has caused us as a nation to resent the U-boat policy of the Imperial Government of Germany; and

Whereas our rights have been maimed and our freedom of the seas molested and we have been forced to protect our rights and freedom and our flag upon the high seas; and

Whereas a disgraceful few of our United States Senators have seen fit, at the expense of the dignity and honor of our country, to play shameface politics along the boundary line of treason to prevent the arming of American merchantmen and defending our honor: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we condemn the attitude that these 12 United States Senators have taken for their acts, their cowardice, their unpatriotism, their failure in supporting the President, and their total disregard for the American flag; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to one newspaper in each town in the county, and also to our Representatives in Congress.

CHAS. WELLS BROWN,
East Quogue, N. Y.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., March 12, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM M. CALDER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At a meeting of the Nineteenth Ward Woodrow Wilson Democratic Club, held Wednesday evening, March 7, the following resolutions were adopted:

"Whereas 500 out of 531 Members of Congress were back of the President of the United States in his stand on the arming of merchantmen; and

"Whereas action by this Government has been delayed by the filibustering of a few United States Senators: Be it

"Resolved, That the Woodrow Wilson Democratic Club of the Nineteenth Ward, of the city of Rochester, N. Y., condemn the action of these few Senators as unpatriotic; and be it further

"Resolved, That this club call upon the Representatives in the House of Representatives from Monroe County and the Senators from the State of New York to stand back of the President in his efforts to uphold the rights of American citizens on the high seas and the honor of this country; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the President of the United States, to the Senators from New York State, and to the Representatives from Monroe County in the House of Representatives."

Yours, very respectfully,

NINETEENTH WARD WOODROW WILSON DEMOCRATIC CLUB,
EDWARD S. O'NEILL, Secretary.

MARCH 12, 1917.

The Common Council of the City of Middletown, N. Y., in meeting assembled, unanimously adopts the following minute:

"After exhausting the resources of diplomacy in an effort to avert war, the President has now taken the only course consistent with national self-respect.

"War with Germany will not ensue unless the Imperial German Government knowingly violates well-settled principles of international law, and violates them with intent definitely hostile to the United States. In that event war will inevitably follow not by our own act, but through the deliberate aggression of another nation.

"If any honest doubt exists respecting the cause of war in Europe, the awful responsibility for extending it to this hemisphere will rest upon Germany, and upon Germany alone.

"It may be that the Imperial German Government is misinformed respecting the temper of the people of the United States, just as that Government is supposed to have misconceived the sentiment of the British Empire at the outbreak of the European war. If so, and before fatal action based upon so grave a mistake is taken, Germany should be made aware of the essential unity of our people and of their loyal determination to make all sacrifices necessary to protect our liberty and to maintain our honor. To this end we call upon all bodies similar to ours throughout the country, and upon all groups of citizens organized for whatever purpose, to meet without delay and express themselves with no uncertain voice respecting the course that they will be prepared to follow.

"We urge all such groups of citizens, secular and religious, large and small, societies, clubs, and institutions of every sort, to unite with us in giving immediate public expression to such convictions as those which we now solemnly record:

"First. That the act of the Executive in severing diplomatic relations with Germany is one to be approved and commended by all who have the best interests of the United States at heart.

"Second. That the German declaration of January 31, 1917, represents an unjustified and unjustifiable attempt to destroy the freedom of the sea and to abridge the commercial liberty guaranteed to us by established law and custom; and that if the Government of the United States were to acquiesce therein such action would be resented by all good citizens as in the highest degree pusillanimous and as altogether inconsistent with the spirit and traditions of a free people.

"Third. That the President will be justified in recommending to Congress the most extreme measures that may be deemed necessary to protect life, liberty, and property; and that it is our duty and that of all loyal citizens to tender immediately to the Government all the service of which we severally and collectively are capable.

"Fourth. That while all should stand ready to volunteer if voluntary service is called for, yet Congress, in providing for our common safety, should not adopt emergency measures merely, but should definitely recognize the principle that the duty of defending the Nation rests equally upon all citizens capable of service. To the end, therefore, that the burden of safeguarding the country should no longer be cast exclusively upon the loyal National Guard and upon other patriotic military and naval volunteers, Congress should be urged to exercise its constitutional power 'to raise and support armies' by establishing immediately a permanent and democratic system of defense based upon universal service and training under direct and exclusive Federal control."

A copy of this minute is ordered to be transmitted to the President of the United States, to the Secretary of War and other members of the Cabinet, and to the members of both congressional Committees on Military Affairs.

G. H. STANTON, Clerk.

I, Frederick A. Stahl, secretary, certify that at a regular meeting of the Republican Organization Club of the Fifteenth Assembly District of Manhattan Borough, New York City, held at the club rooms, No. 2228 Broadway, on the 7th day of March, 1917, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas a crisis has arisen in our international relations threatening the peace, security, and welfare of our country; and

"Whereas a policy of complete preparedness is the surest safeguard for peace; and

"Whereas the present situation has made clear the urgent necessity for some form of military system adequate for the defense of this Nation and commensurate with its dignity; and

"Whereas a volunteer system is inefficient and undemocratic in that it favors the 'slacker' at the expense of the willing and patriotic citizen: Therefore be it

"Resolved—

"First. That this organization pledges its loyal support to the President of the United States in the present emergency;

"Second. That we are heartily in favor of preparedness against war in the shape of a powerful Navy and an efficient Army backed by a trained citizenry;

"Third. That we earnestly urge the adoption of a system of universal military training; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be forwarded to the President of the United States and to the two Senators from the State of New York."

FREDERICK A. STAHL, Secretary.

THE CONGRESSIONAL DIRECTORY.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 11), which was read:

Resolved, That an edition of the Congressional Directory for the first session of the Sixty-fifth Congress be prepared and published, as provided for in section 73 of the printing act approved January 12, 1895, and that the sum of $800 for compiling, preparing, and indexing said edition be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon voucher to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, the resolution will have to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as provided by law, as there is an appropriation involved.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is correct, Mr. President. I will state that the printing law provides for three issues of the Congressional Directory at each regular session, but does not provide for an edition at an extra session, and such edition must be authorized by a resolution. The extra session will assemble next month with an entire new House and one-third of the Senate new, and it is important, I think, that we should have an edition of the Directory at that time.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is correct in his statement. I only called attention to the fact that the resolution must go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. It must go there. I ask that it be so referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the rule, the resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

EMPLOYMENT OF ADDITIONAL CLERK.

Mr. JAMES (for Mr. POMERENE) submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 12), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the United States Senate be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ an additional clerk at the rate of $100 per month, to be paid out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided by law.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. UNDERWOOD submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 13), which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That the rules of the Senate be amended by adding thereto, in lieu of the rule adopted by the Senate for the limitation of debate on March 8, 1917, the following:

"1. There shall be a motion for the previous question, which, being ordered by a majority of Senators voting, if a quorum be present, shall have the effect to cut off all debate and bring the Senate to a direct vote upon the immediate question or questions on which it has been asked and ordered. The previous question may be asked and ordered upon a single motion, a series of motions allowable under the rules, or an amendment or amendments, or may be made to embrace all authorized motions or amendments and include the bill to its passage or rejection. It shall be in order, pending the motion for or after the previous question shall have been ordered on its passage, for the Presiding Officer to entertain and submit a motion to commit, with or without instructions, to a standing or select committee.

"2. All motions for the previous question shall, before being submitted to the Senate, be seconded by a majority by tellers, if demanded.

"3. When a motion for the previous question has been seconded it shall be in order, before final vote is taken thereon, for each Senator to debate the propositions to be voted upon for one hour."

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

TREATY WITH COLOMBIA—INJUNCTION OF SECRECY REMOVED.

On motion of Mr. STONE the injunction of secrecy was removed from the following documents pertaining to the treaty with Colombia for the settlement of differences with that country (Ex. H., 63d Cong., 2d sess.), and they were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, together with a copy of the treaty.

Mr. STONE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, submitted the following report:

[S. Rept. 1, pt. 1, 65th Cong., special session, in executive session.]

"By direction of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I hereby report, with certain amendments, the treaty concluded between the United States and the Republic of Colombia, dated April 6, 1914, and transmitted by the President to the Senate for the action of this body thereon, and which in due course, under the rules of the Senate, was referred to said committee. The committee recommends that the treaty, as amended, should be ratified by a resolution in the form herewith submitted.

"The amendments to the treaty agreed to by the committee are as follows:

"1. Strike out clause 1 of Article I of the original text of the treaty, which is in the following language:

"The Government of the United States of America, wishing to put at rest all controversies and differences with the Republic of Colombia arising out of the events from which the present situation on the Isthmus of Panama resulted, expresses, in its own name and in the name of the people of the United States, sincere regret that anything should have occurred to interrupt or to mar the relations of cordial friendship that had so long subsisted between the two nations.

"And in lieu thereof insert the following:

"The Governments of the United States of America and the Republic of Colombia, in their own names and in the names of their respective peoples, wishing to put at rest all controversies and differences between them arising out of the events from which the present situation on the Isthmus of Panama resulted, express sincere regret that anything should have occurred to interrupt or to mar the relations of cordial friendship that had so long subsisted between the two nations.

"2. After Article IV, in the original text of the treaty, insert the following:

"ARTICLE V.

"That neither the making of this convention nor any of the stipulations herein contained shall be considered to cast any doubt or shadow upon the title of the United States to the Panama Canal, which title the Government of Colombia recognizes as entire, absolute, and complete in the United States of America.

"3. Change the number of Article V, as it appears in the original text of the treaty, to Article VI.

"It is the judgment of the committee that the treaty, as so amended, should be ratified. The treaty should be considered solely on its merits as a question of present moment, without regard to the circumstances out of which the long-standing differences between Colombia and the United States originated. Whatever may be the different opinions of men with respect to the occurrences out of which the pending troubles between the two countries originated, it is believed it would be the part of wisdom for both Governments, since both are desirous of restoring their old amicable relations, to put the past behind them. It would be bootless to revive a partisan issue here or elsewhere with respect to past events. The things of the past are now written in history, and no present good can come by recalling and rediscussing old issues.

"The wise thing to do is to deal with the subject before us as a live question of present importance. If the two countries wish to reestablish, as it must be assumed they do, cordial relations of amity, then let them mutually agree to settle their differences without engaging in the futile and obstructive business of crimination and recrimination concerning events which occurred and which were irrevocably settled years ago. There can be no doubt that the people of the United States sincerely desire to have and maintain the most friendly relations with the people of Colombia. The desire of the United States to maintain such relations, not only with Colombia but with all the Latin Republics of Central and South America, has been demonstrated so often and in so many ways that the attitude of this country in that behalf is well defined and universally known. This attitude has been made known not only by the course of the present administration but also by that of former administrations. Several treaties have been made between the United States and Colombia looking to the settlement of these particular differences which have unhappily arisen between them. But for one reason or another, none of these treaties was agreed to by both Governments. In all of these treaties the United States, out of the desire to settle the controversy, has offered to make recompense to Colombia by way of satisfaction for her claim for damages. These offers have been made without regard to the merits of the Colombian claim, which has not been conceded by this Government to be well founded. The paramount idea with us has been to adjust this unfortunate international difference. It is to be hoped that the Senate will now consider this treaty from that broad standpoint.

"There are numerous other important reasons, which have been often stated both here and in the Central and South American States, why cordial relations of confidence and good will should exist between all the American Republics. It is manifestly to the interest of all that this should be so. If differences between them should unfortunately arise, they should be settled as friends kindly disposed to each other should settle their controversies. That spirit of dealing with each other is of the highest importance to all the American Republics. It is to be hoped that the Senate of the United States will now deal with this question at this time in this spirit."

Mr. KNOX, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, asked and obtained leave to file his separate views, as follows:

SEPARATE VIEWS OF MR. KNOX.

I am prepared to vote in favor of the consent of the Senate to the ratification of an American-Colombian treaty that expressly does not impugn in any way the past attitude, acts, or motives of this Government.

At a time when American interests, the interests of all the 20 other republics of this hemisphere, and the interests of the world imposed upon the United States an urgent and imperative mandate to construct the Panama Canal, the course of events finally left the United States no choice but political action if the great work was not to be indefinitely delayed. The historian will justify this Government, as those informed of the circumstances now do.

It is not regrettable, I think, that such a treaty has awaited ratification for nearly three years. Its instant acceptance might have encouraged the idea, mooted in this connection a few years ago, that foreign interests might avail of party politics in our country. Believing it vital to the United States that American foreign policy should pursue a course united, continuous, dignified, and removed high above partisan considerations, I think this time more opportune than an earlier date for the ratification of the treaty now under consideration.

My idea of the power of the United States and of the prestige it ought of right to have, as well as my conception of Pan American relations, impel me to remark that I do not consider that the exceedingly grave crisis impending is seriously germane or appropriately to be invoked in connection with the ratification of a treaty with Colombia. The wisdom of that action rests upon broader and sounder grounds. The inception of the purpose to compose the differences with Colombia preceded the present world crisis many years and the signing of the treaty antedated the beginning of the European war. To safeguard our interests to-day there remain neglected many and obvious vital measures of preparedness. If this treaty represented a sort of barter for friendship, that would be most questionable in itself. An implication that the power which stands for the Monroe doctrine should thus seek safety in friendships, while at the same time neglecting to arm for its defense and the maintenance of its rights, would connate a level to which I trust the United States will never sink.

But the advisability of ratifying a fair treaty rests upon a sound basis. Colombia is neighbor to our stupendous enterprise on the Isthmus; Colombia fronts upon our vital sphere of interest, the neighborhood of the Panama Canal and the zone of the Caribbean, where strategic reasons have recently induced us to pay a great sum for the Danish West Indies. Colombia and the United States have a peculiar mutuality of interests due to geographical, economic, and strategic circumstances. The two countries are especially fitted for close amity and cooperation. It is the historic policy of the United States to recognize these ideas and to foster this realization. This was true from early times, and the policy forced upon the United States in 1903–4 implied no change.

By the Hay-Herran treaty it was contemplated that Colombia should profit financially and otherwise on account of her former interest on the Isthmus. In the entirely new status quo following the secession of Panama the same intention was shown in this Government's negotiation of the Root-Cortez treaties. The same good disposition toward Colombia actuated the efforts made by this Government in 1912 and 1913, which were described in President Taft's message to Congress March 1, 1913, and which paved the way for the present treaty.

Believing that the power and the prestige of the United States in its foreign relations, no less than the funds of the Treasury, are intrusted to this Government not for dissipation in shadowy or millennial projects but for the practical benefit of real American interests, I have considered this treaty from the point of view of its contribution to the general welfare of this Nation in the sense of the Constitution. I find the treaty conscionable and proper in that respect. It adds formal and complete regularization to the actual situation on the Isthmus of Panama, where the canal gives America an interest so colossal as to make this at least desirable. Perhaps its most important provision is that it adjusts the political relations between Panama and Colombia. The real ground of Colombia's complaint against the United States has all along been Colombia's claim that the United States espoused the cause of Panama at the time of the revolution. By article 4 of the treaty Colombia "recognizes Panama as an independent nation," and further agrees to a program looking to the establishment of diplomatic relations and adjustment of all differences. In view of our relations to Panama, and especially of our guaranty of her independence, this is a most important consideration. This treaty differs in degree or character of consideration and other details, but not in principle, from two sets of contemplated treaties which, if consummated, would have embodied the policies of the last two Republican administrations. It will end a grievance which, whether fancied or real, has grown so traditional as to be unsusceptible of obliteration in any other way.

There exists a real and long-standing difference between the United States and Colombia. In the interest of peace and good will both wish to compromise that difference, which is to be done upon the well-known principle that the compromise of a difference need carry no implication of wrong on either part. In this view, and for the reasons stated, I favor the Senate's advice and consent to the ratification of the reported treaty, as a consistent nonpartisan act, conformable to the foreign policy of the United States.

P. C. KNOX.

Mr. McCUMBER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, asked and obtained leave to file the views of a minority, as follows:

[S. Rept. 1, pt. 2, 65th Cong., special session, in executive session.]

The undersigned minority members of the Committee on Foreign Relations agree most heartily with the declaration contained in the majority report that "no good can come by recalling and discussing old issues." But we beg to remind the majority that this proposed treaty does exactly that thing. What are we paying this $25,000,000 for except in settlement of old issues? Will not the American people ask this question, and can we avoid the answer that it is in payment of something that grew out of that past issue? What does the United States receive for this vast sum? Absolutely nothing, either corporeal or incorporeal. Colombia grants nothing, parts with nothing which she possesses.

This payment, then, can only be predicated on the assumption that we are indebted to Colombia, either morally or legally, and no combination of words, no niceties of diplomatic language can hide the naked truth that this treaty is an admission that the conduct of this country in acquiring the right to construct a canal across the Isthmus of Panama was a wrong committed against Colombia. On no other hypothesis could Colombia ask for this indemnity of $25,000,000, and on no other could we acquiesce in that demand.

While there is an attempt in the beginning of the report by careful wording to veil this disagreeable aspect of the case, it is, nevertheless, forced into relief as the moving consideration for this great outlay in another sentence of that report, which reads as follows: "In all of these treaties the United States, out of the desire to settle the controversy, has offered to make recompense to Colombia by way of satisfaction for her claim for damages." There is a clear admission that we are paying this sum to settle a claim for damages. By making the payment we admit the claim.

The minority of the committee desire to go on record as denying the charge which this payment recognizes as valid, that this country was guilty of any international misconduct in the acquisition of the territory on which the canal was constructed.

On the contrary, the minority declare that our conduct in securing an agreement from Panama was just and proper in every respect and that the Colombian Government has no just or equitable claim against this Nation for any act on our part in connection therewith.

This treaty is, in effect, not only a plea of guilty to the charge made against us by Colombia, but an agreement that, in addition to the payment of $10,000,000, the price for which the Government of Colombia had agreed to convey to us the right of way over the Isthmus, while she claimed sovereign rights over that territory, we shall also pay $15,000,000 to Colombia as exemplary damages. No other construction can or will be placed by the world on our action.

Nor can we avoid this conclusion by declaring to the world that we are paying this vast sum, two and a half times greater than we paid Panama for our right of way, "to establish cordial relations of amity." We can not afford to purchase cordial relations with any country. We can not afford to answer a blackmail demand. Once respond to such a demand and we shall be held up for every fancied wrong by other countries.

This treaty involves two questions: First, whether on its merits it ought to be ratified by the Senate; and, second, whether any treaty with Colombia ought, under existing circumstances, to be ratified at this time. In our opinion Colombia, by her conduct at the time of the Hay-Herran treaty, forfeited all claim upon the United States on account of the latter's acquisition of the Canal Zone and its accompanying rights from the Republic of Panama. But assuming that a treaty is to be made at all, the undersigned regard the one now presented to the Senate as improvident and unworthy. This treaty contains an apology for past conduct on the part of the United States which, however veiled, is still an apology. It proposes to give Colombia the enormous sum of twenty-five millions with no return, no equivalent except the highly doubtful good will of Colombia. All the articles confer rights and privileges upon Colombia, and the United States gets nothing, neither the control of the Atrato route nor the important islands provided for in the Knox treaty, nor even a formal recognition of the title of the United States to the canal and the Canal Zone. It seems to the minority that such a treaty, giving a huge sum of money to a country which has, strictly speaking, forfeited all claims upon the United States by its own conduct, is not to be defended and should not be ratified.

Another grave objection to this treaty will be found in the first clause of Article II, which makes an exception in favor of Colombian transit of the canal, particularly for her ships, munitions of war, and armed forces, not provided for in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. It discriminates as to canal tolls for all such transit against all other Latin-American countries, as well as against our own ships even in the coastwise trade. It places us in a position where, even granting our right to refuse transit to the armed forces and vessels of countries at war with us, Colombia might pass the vessels of the countries with which we are at war through the canal by putting them under her own flag and claiming them as her nationals.

The second objection which lies against any possible treaty with Colombia at this time is to be found in the fact that immediate and hasty action is urged because Colombia threatens us with hostility. Any friendship which is bought is worthless, especially when purchased under threats which, when successful, breed contempt in the mind of the seller and a sense of bitter dislike and humiliation in that of the buyer. No strong and proud nation should ever consent to buy with money the abstention from hostility of any country which sees fit to threaten it. It is a degradation to which the United States should never submit.

If we believed that we had wronged the Colombian Government we should be quick to repair that wrong. As we believe we have not done that country any injustice, we earnestly protest against the purchase of her friendship.

Mr. STONE submitted the resolution of ratification, as follows:

RESOLUTION OF RATIFICATION.

"Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty, signed at Bogota April 6, 1914, between the United States and the Republic of Colombia, for the settlement of their differences arising out of the events which took place on the Isthmus of Panama, November 19, 1903, with the following amendments:

"I. Strike out clause 1 of Article I of the original text of the treaty, which is in the following language:

"The Government of the United States of America, wishing to put at rest all controversies and differences with the Republic of Colombia arising out of the events from which the present situation on the Isthmus of Panama resulted, expresses, in its own name and the name of the people of the United States, sincere regret that anything should have occurred to interrupt or to mar the relations of cordial friendship that had so long subsisted between two nations.

"And in lieu thereof insert the following:

"The Governments of the United States of America and the Republic of Colombia, in their own names and the names of their respective peoples, wishing to put at rest all controversies and differences between them arising out of the events from which the present situation on the Isthmus of Panama resulted, express sincere regret that anything should have occurred to interrupt or to mar the relations of cordial friendship that had so long subsisted between the two Nations.

"II. After Article IV in the original text of the treaty insert the following:

"ARTICLE V.

"That neither the making of this convention nor any of the stipulations herein contained shall be considered to cast any doubt or shadow upon the title of the United States to the Panama Canal, which title the Government of Colombia recognizes as entire, absolute, and complete in the United States of America.

"III. Change the number 'Article V,' as it appears in the original text of the treaty, to 'Article VI.'

"Provided, That nothing in this treaty shall be construed to impugn in any way the past attitude, acts, and motives of this Government."

The proposed treaty is as follows:

[Senate Executive H, 63d Cong., 2d sess.]

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, June 16, 1914.

The PRESIDENT:

The undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President, with a view to its transmission to the Senate to receive the advice and consent of that body to its ratification, a treaty signed at Bogota on April 6, 1914, between the United States and the Republic of Colombia, for the settlement of their differences arising out of the events which took place on the Isthmus of Panama in November, 1903.

Respectfully submitted.

WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 16, 1914.

TREATY BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND THE REPUBLIC OF COLOMBIA FOR THE SETTLEMENT OF THEIR DIFFERENCES ARISING OUT OF THE EVENTS WHICH TOOK PLACE ON THE ISTHMUS OF PANAMA IN NOVEMBER, 1903.

The United States of America and the Republic of Colombia, being desirous to remove all the misunderstandings growing out of the political events in Panama in November, 1903; to restore the cordial friendship that formerly characterized the relations between the two countries, and also to define and regulate their rights and interests in respect of the interoceanic canal which the Government of the United States is constructing across the Isthmus of Panama, have resolved for this purpose to conclude a treaty and have accordingly appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

His Excellency the President of the United States of America: Thaddeus Austin Thomson, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Government of the Republic of Colombia; and

His Excellency the President of the Republic of Colombia: Francisco José Urrutia, minister for foreign affairs; Marco Fidel Suárez, first designate to exercise the executive power; Nicolás Esguerra, ex-minister of State; José Maria González Valencia, senator; Rafael Uribe Uribe, senator; and Antonio José Uribe, president of the House of Representatives;

Who, after communicating to each other their respective full powers, which were found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following:

ARTICLE I.

The Government of the United States of America, wishing to put at rest all controversies and differences with the Republic of Colombia arising out of the events from which the present situation on the Isthmus of Panama resulted, expresses, in its own name and in the name of the people of the United States, sincere regret that anything should have occurred to interrupt or to mar the relations of cordial friendship that had so long subsisted between the two nations.

The Government of the Republic of Colombia, in its own name and in the name of the Colombian people, accepts this declaration in the full assurance that every obstacle to the restoration of complete harmony between the two countries will thus disappear.

ARTICLE II.

The Republic of Colombia shall enjoy the following rights in respect to the interoceanic canal and the Panama Railway:

1. The Republic of Colombia shall be at liberty at all times to transport through the interoceanic canal its troops, materials of war, and ships of war, even in case of war between Colombia and another country, without paying any charges to the United States.

2. The products of the soil and industry of Colombia passing through the canal, as well as the Colombian mails, shall be exempt from any charge or duty other than those to which the products and mails of the United States may be subject. The products of the soil and industry of Colombia, such as cattle, salt, and provisions, shall be admitted to entry in the Canal Zone, and likewise in the islands and mainland occupied or which may be occupied by the United States as auxiliary and accessory thereto, without paying other duties or charges than those payable by similar products of the United States.

3. Colombian citizens crossing the Canal Zone shall, upon production of proper proof of their nationality, be exempt from every toll, tax, or duty to which citizens of the United States are not subject.

4. During the construction of the interoceanic canal and afterwards, whenever traffic by the canal is interrupted or whenever it shall be necessary for any other reason to use the railway, the troops, materials of war, products, and mails of the Republic of Colombia, as above mentioned, shall, even in case of war between Colombia and another country, be transported on the railway between Ancon and Cristobal or on any other railway substituted therefor, paying only the same charges and duties as are imposed upon the troops, materials of war, products, and mails of the United States. The officers, agents, and employees of the Government of Colombia shall, upon production of proper proof of their official character or their employment, also be entitled to passage on the said railway on the same terms as officers, agents, and employees of the Government of the United States. The provisions of this paragraph shall not, however, apply in case of war between Colombia and Panama.

5. Coal, petroleum, and sea salt, being the products of Colombia, passing from the Atlantic coast of Colombia to any Colombian port on the Pacific coast, and vice versa, shall be transported over the aforesaid railway free of any charge except the actual cost of handling and transportation, which shall not in any case exceed one-half of the ordinary freight charges levied upon similar products of the United States passing over the railway and in transit from one port to another of the United States.

ARTICLE III.

The United States of America agrees to pay to the Republic of Colombia, within six months after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, the sum of $25,000,000 gold, United States money.

ARTICLE IV.

The Republic of Colombia recognizes Panama as an independent nation and taking as a basis the Colombian law of June 9, 1855, agrees that the boundary shall be the following: From Cape Tiburon to the headwaters of the Rio de la Miel and following the mountain chain by the ridge of Gandi to the Sierra de Chugargun and that of Mali going down by the ridges of Nigue to the heights of Aspave and from thence to a point on the Pacific halfway between Cocalito and La Arvita.

In consideration of this recognition the Government of the United States will, immediately after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, take the necessary steps in order to obtain from the Government of Panama the dispatch of a duly accredited agent to negotiate and conclude with the Government of Colombia a treaty of peace and friendship, with a view to bring about both the establishment of regular diplomatic relations between Colombia and Panama and the adjustment of all questions of pecuniary liability as between the two countries, in accordance with recognized principles of law and precedents.

ARTICLE V.

The present treaty shall be approved and ratified by the high contracting parties in conformity with their respective laws, and the ratifications thereof shall be exchanged in the city of Bogotá as soon as may be possible.

In faith whereof the said plenipotentiaries have signed the present treaty in duplicate and have hereunto affixed their respective seals.

Done at the city of Bogotá the 6th day of April in the year of our Lord 1914.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 15, 1917.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we call upon Thee continually amid the deepening shadows that surround us and invoke Thy guidance and Thy blessing upon us. In the midst of constant demands for force we fear that we may not pursue with ardor the great ideals that involve the true, the beautiful, and the good. We pray that Thou wilt keep guard over our hearts and minds, that we forget not Thy name, and that we remember that Thou art interested in the beauty of life, and its grace, and its purity. So do Thou keep us in the midst of the stress and storm of human life untouched by its evils unto life eternal. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

AMERICAN REGISTRY OF VESSELS.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I submit the following resolution, and I ask unanimous consent that it be immediately considered.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 16, 1917.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we call upon Thy name with reverence and seek Thy blessing not only that we may be guided for the solemn responsibility of office but that in the larger sphere of our personal life, where we touch and mold public opinion, where we help or hinder our fellow men, we may have the guidance and blessing of God. Help us to lift the burden, help us to make the way more happy, help us to elevate the ideals of the people, and out of our personal consecration to the ideals of the Gospel of Thy Son may we be enabled to refine and purify the lives of those we touch with our lives. To this end do Thou keep us under Thy grace and care and leadership this day. For Christ's sake. Amen.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Secretary will read the Journal of the proceedings of the preceding session.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

THE CONGRESSIONAL DIRECTORY.

Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 11, submitted by Mr. FLETCHER on the 14th instant, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That an edition of the Congressional Directory for the first session of the Sixty-fifth Congress be prepared and published, as provided for in section 73 of the printing act approved January 12, 1895, and that the sum of $800, for compiling, preparing, and indexing said edition, be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon voucher to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

TREATY WITH COLOMBIA.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to present to the Senate a memorial from the legislature of my State, and I ask the indulgence of the Senate for four or five minutes in doing so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection——

Mr. JAMES. What is the request?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To present a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to use four or five minutes of the time of the Senate in doing it.

Mr. President, I present to the Senate a memorial from the Legislature of the State of Washington. It was, no doubt, adopted in the midst of the excitement of a few days ago caused by the imperfect and biased newspaper reports of the proceedings of Congress and by misrepresentations and untruthful statements from a source much higher but which it had a right to assume to be entirely trustworthy.

This resolution pledges the people and resources of the State of Washington to support the President in arming merchant ships and "all other measures, ways, and means which the President believes to be necessary and expedient," and so forth. While it does not in express terms ask me to do this, I assume that it expects me to do it. In fact, in so far as it can do so it pledges me to do it. In effect, it pledges me as a citizen of our State and a Member of one of the coordinate branches of the Government to abdicate my power and shirk my responsibilities by turning these over to the President. It pledges me to support whatever "measures" or "expedient" he may deem necessary for the defense of our honor and the maintenance of the rights of American citizens, regardless of whether it meets with my conception of duty or not. I can not do that without being recreant to the oath which I took to support the Constitution and laws of our country and to discharge the duties of my office according to my ability.

The approval of the treaty we are now considering is urged by the President and a majority of the committee as a necessary "measure" or "expedient" to meet the present critical foreign situation. In the Washington Times of a couple of days ago it was stated that Senator MARTIN after a call upon the President reported to the Democratic caucus that the President was more than ever insistent that the Colombian treaty should be ratified, and said:

> The President explained that he wanted the treaty passed at once, in order to remove all danger of trouble at this time in the vicinity of the Panama Canal.

And referring to a recent appeal of the President in behalf of the Colombian treaty it was said:

> On that occasion he observed significantly that at the present time, of all times, the United States needs the friendship of Colombia and other Latin-American countries.

And Senator LODGE, the ranking minority member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, who knows what representations have been made, said, in a statement issued a day or two ago:

> We are told that Colombia will furnish submarine bases for Germany from which she can assail our shipping and the Panama Canal and, therefore, in the present crisis we must ratify the treaty and buy Colombia off with $25,000,000 and an apology.

Mr. President, I am not in favor of Zimmermannism on the part of Germany——

Mr. STONE. If the Senator will permit me, the Senate declined to consider the treaty in open session.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am just referring to some statements made in open session and I am stating the reason why I can not comply in this respect with the demand of the resolution of the legislature of my State. I have just another page.

Mr. STONE. The Senator understands——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am just referring to statements that have been made in the public press.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Missouri yielded to the Senator from Washington in order that he might present a memorial of his State legislature.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I told the Senator I wanted to use four or five minutes in connection with the presentation of the memorial.

Mr. STONE. The Senator did say that he had a memorial he wished to present and that he would like to take three or four minutes in some explanation of it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. STONE. I said, of course, that was all right. I did not know what it was about.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think the Senator will see the pertinency of what I am saying as to the resolution of the legislature which I present.

Mr. President, I am not in favor of Zimmermannism on the part of Germany, and I am not in favor of Zimmermannism on the part of this country, and that is what the approval of this treaty means as now urged. Zimmermannism proposed to give Mexico certain territory of the United States if she would help Germany in case of war with this country. It is now urged that we should pay Colombia $25,000,000 of our money to secure simply her neutrality in case we get into war with Germany. I can not vote for a treaty urged for such a purpose. I can not support such a "measure" or "expedient" even though the legislature of my State has, so far as it can do, pledged me to do so. That, to my mind, dishonors the Nation. I can not approve by my vote such a position, and I do not believe that my legislature would want me to do it, even though they have passed a resolution so sweeping in its terms as to cover such a request from the President. It simply illustrates the unwisdom of using broad and general expressions in a resolution really intended to cover a particular matter.

I will go as far as I possibly can to carry out the wishes and pledges of the legislature of my State. I will support to the limit every act of the President, whether right or wrong, in his dealings with foreign countries done within the limits of his constitutional powers, and possibly go even further where he may have already acted. I will support to the limit every act done by a majority of Congress within its constitutional powers, whether in my judgment right or wrong; and if this treaty is ratified I will then cheerfully assist in carrying it out, but even though pledged to do so by the legislature of my State, composed, as I know it to be, of able, earnest, and patriotic men, I will not violate my convictions of duty nor shirk the responsibility placed upon me by the Constitution and vote for this treaty on the grounds urged.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] in a statement the other day expressed my views better than I can express them when he said:

> I shall most cheerfully join in giving the President every power he needs and vote to place on the statute books every necessary law to help us win the war as soon as possible, if war must come; but I will not vote to betray gratuitously my country's honor and to drag her through the deepest humiliation by submitting to blackmailing threats and naked coercion from Colombia or any other State.
> It matters not whether her claim is meritorious or worthless. It must not be extorted from the United States by threats of war or of alliance with Germany.

I ask unanimous consent that the memorial of the State legislature be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the request?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask unanimous consent that the memorial may be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Together with the remarks just made by the Senator?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Clearly the remarks made by the Senator were upon executive business and were not made in executive session, but they have been made, and I do not suppose they will do any great amount of harm. I shall not object, but certainly nobody considered in granting unanimous consent that he was granting the right to discuss the treaty outside of executive session.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator will do me the justice to say that whatever I have quoted has been in the public press and is practically contained in the report which has been made upon the treaty. I would not willingly violate any rule or any of the secrets of executive session, and I do not think I have done so. I will let my remarks speak for themselves in that respect.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I said I would not object. It will not do any harm.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE STATE OF WASHINGTON,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

To all to whom these presents shall come:

I, I. M. Howell, secretary of state of the State of Washington and custodian of the seal of said State, do hereby certify that I have carefully compared the annexed copy of senate joint resolution No. 14 of the Fifteenth Session of the Legislature of the State of Washington with the original copy of said resolution as enrolled, now on file in this office, and find the same to be a full, true, and correct copy of said original, and of the whole thereof, together with all official indorsements thereon.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed hereto the seal of the State of Washington. Done at the capitol at Olympia, this 7th day of March, A. D. 1917.

[SEAL.] I. M. HOWELL,
Secretary of State.

Senate joint resolution 14.

Whereas the United States of America is face to face with a grave national crisis revealing a foreign conspiracy to invade our country after the repeated murder of our citizens on the high seas, the driving of our ships and commerce from the ocean, and practically establishing a blockade of our ports; Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the State of Washington in legislative session assembled, That the State of Washington be pledged to stand by the President to the limit of its resources in men and money, for arming our merchant ships and in support of all other measures, ways, and means which the President believes to be necessary or expedient for the defense of the country and the full protection of the lives, property, and just rights of American citizens on sea and land.

The secretary of state is hereby instructed to prepare copies of this resolution and transmit the same to the President of the United States, the Senate and House of Representatives, and the Members of the Washington delegation to the United States Congress.

Passed the senate March 5, 1917.

LOUIS F. HART,
President of the Senate.

SEVERANCE OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH GERMANY.

Mr. HARDWICK. I present a memorial which I ask may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Greater Savannah Commercial Club, of the city of Savannah, Ga., in meeting assembled unanimously adopts the following minute:

"After exhausting the resources of diplomacy in an effort to avert war the President has now taken the only course consistent with national self-respect.

"War with Germany will not ensue unless the Imperial German Government knowingly violates well-settled principles of international law, and violates them with intent definitely hostile to the United States. In that event war will inevitably follow, not by our own act but through the deliberate choice of a self-confessed disturber of the peace of the Western World.

"If any honest doubt exists respecting the cause of war in Europe, the awful responsibility for extending it to this hemisphere will rest upon Germany, and upon Germany alone.

"It may be that the Imperial German Government is misinformed respecting the temper of the people of the United States, just as that Government is supposed to have misconceived the sentiment of the British Empire at the outbreak of the European war. If so, and before fatal action based upon so grave a mistake is taken, Germany should be made aware of the essential unity of our people and of their loyal determination to make all sacrifices necessary to protect our liberty and maintain our honor. To this end we call upon all bodies similar to ours throughout the country and upon all groups of citizens organized for whatever purpose to meet without delay and express themselves with no uncertain voice respecting the course that they will be prepared to follow.

"We urge all such groups of citizens, secular and religious, large and small, societies, clubs, and institutions of every sort to unite with us in giving immediate public expression to such convictions as those which we now solemnly record:

"First. That the act of the Executive in severing diplomatic relations with Germany is one to be approved and commended by all who have the best interests of the United States at heart.

"Second. That the German declaration of January 31, 1917, represents an unjustified and unjustifiable attempt to destroy the freedom of the sea and to abridge the commercial liberty guaranteed to us by established law and custom; and that if the Government of the United States were to acquiesce therein such action would be resented by all good citizens as in the highest degree pusillanimous and as altogether inconsistent with the spirit and tradition of a free people.

"Third. That the President will be justified in recommending to Congress the most extreme measure that may be deemed necessary to protect life, liberty, and property, and that it is our duty and that of all loyal citizens to tender immediately to the Government all the service of which we severally and collectively are capable.

"Fourth. That while all should stand ready to volunteer if voluntary service is called for, yet Congress, in providing for our common safety, should not adopt emergency measures merely, but should definitely recognize the principle that the duty of defending the Nation rests equally upon all citizens capable of service. To the end, therefore, that the burden of safeguarding the country should no longer be cast exclusively upon the loyal National Guard and upon other patriotic military and naval volunteers, Congress should be urged to exercise its constitutional power 'to raise and support armies' by establishing immediately a permanent and democratic system of defense based upon universal service and training under direct and exclusive Federal control."

A copy of this minute is ordered to be transmitted to the President of the United States, to the Secretary of War, and to the State Representatives in the National Congress.

I certify the above to be a true copy of minute adopted at meeting of the Greater Savannah Commercial Club at its meeting held March 8, 1917.

E. L. GOODMAN, Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, the Legislature of Vermont is in session, and has adopted resolutions touching current events. I will not ask that the valuable time of the Senate be taken while I read the resolutions or have them read by the Secretary, but as indicating the general nature of the resolutions I will read the first paragraph, and ask that the entire resolutions may be printed in the RECORD.

This is the first paragraph:

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives, That the State of Vermont, through her legislature, duly assembled in regular session, does hereby renew her allegiance and fealty to the Government of the United States, and pledges her support to the President in whatever lawful steps he may take in defense of the national honor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolutions will be printed in the RECORD.

The resolutions are as follows:

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives, That the State of Vermont, through her legislature, duly assembled in regular session, does hereby renew her allegiance and fealty to the Government of the United States and pledges her support to the President in whatever lawful steps he may take in defense of the national honor.

That we commend the patriotism and loyalty of her Representatives in the United States Senate, Hon. WILLIAM P. DILLINGHAM and Hon. CARROLL S. PAGE, and applaud their unselfish and high-minded devotion to the national welfare in a grave international crisis.

That we approve of their desire to authorize the President to arm American vessels in self-defense against the submarine menace, and we disapprove of the action of those who made it impossible for that desire to find expression in a vote.

That we further approve of their signature to a manifesto expressing that desire and conviction, and hereby support and indorse their action.

That we also approve the loyal and consistent support of the President's position on this subject expressed in the National House of Representatives by the votes of Congressmen FRANK L. GREENE and PORTER H. DALE.

That we further commend to our Senators their consideration of such revision of procedure as will make it henceforth impossible for a small group of Senators to defeat the will of the people, tie the President's hands, and place us, before the nations of the world, in a false and humiliating light.

That a copy of this resolution be sent to each of our Representatives in Congress and an additional copy to Senator DILLINGHAM, to be by him transmitted to the President.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After two hours and fifteen minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

TREATY WITH COLOMBIA.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I have a letter from the President which I would like to have printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be received and printed in the RECORD.

The letter is as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, February 17, 1917.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I take the liberty of writing to ask you if it will not be possible to press the pending treaty with Colombia again for ratification. I must admit my surprise that there should be any objection to its consideration or to immediate action upon it in view of the unusual circumstances of the moment.

The main argument for the treaty and for its immediate ratification is, of course, that in it we seek to do justice to Colombia and to settle a long-standing controversy which has sadly interfered with the cordial relations between the two Republics. In addition to that argument, which should be conclusive, there is this only too obvious consideration, that we need now and it is possible shall need very much more in the immediate future all the friends we can attach to us in Central America, where so many of our most critical interests center.

I would very much like your advice as to this matter. It seems to me that those who oppose this treaty must be thoughtless of the present situation.

Cordially and faithfully, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

Hon. WILLIAM J. STONE,
United States Senate.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

At 1 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m. the doors were reopened.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 18) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of two Senators be appointed by the President pro tempore to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that the Senate, having completed the business of the present session, is ready to adjourn unless the President has some other communication to make to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. MARTIN and Mr. WARREN as the committee to wait upon the President.

AMERICAN REGISTRY OF VESSELS (S. DOC. NO. 4).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Commerce transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 15th instant, detailed information relative to all sea-going vessels for which application has been made for registry under the laws of the United States, and so forth. The communication and accompanying papers will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, should not this communication be printed in the RECORD?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will entertain a motion to that effect.

Mr. FLETCHER. Would the Senator from Missouri like to have the communication printed in the RECORD?

Mr. STONE. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. FLETCHER. I take it that the order of the Chair that the communication be referred to the Committee on Commerce still obtains, and that it will be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication and accompanying papers will be printed as a document, printed in the RECORD, and referred to the committee on Commerce.

The communication is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, March 16, 1917.

SIR: I have received the following resolution adopted in the Senate of the United States March 15, 1917:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce be, and is hereby, directed to forthwith prepare and furnish, or cause to be forthwith prepared and furnished, to the Senate a full list of all seagoing vessels for which application has been made for registry under the laws of the United States, and also what vessels for which such application has been made have been in fact granted registration, between January 1, 1916, and March 15, 1917; and that in said list it shall be set forth (1) the name and character of the vessel before the application for registry was made, and the name under which the registration was granted; (2) the name of the nation under whose registration and flag each of said vessels operated prior to the application for United States registration; (3) the name or names of the person or persons, or association or corporation, applying for United States registration in each instance; (4) and the exact date of both the application for and the issuance of the registry in each instance."

The detailed information desired is attached, covering 39 foreign vessels of 93,711 gross tons transferred from foreign to American registry from January 1, 1916, to March 15, 1917, inclusive. Of these totals 7 vessels of 10,369 gross tons were admitted to registry as wrecked vessels repaired in American shipyards under the act of February 24, 1915. During the fiscal year ended June 30, 1915, foreign-built vessels admitted to American registry aggregated 513,306 gross tons. The great decline in foreign tonnage admitted to American registry since December 31, 1915, is due in part to the fact that during 1915 and 1916 practically all maritime nations enacted laws or issued decrees prohibiting the sale of merchant vessels under their respective flags to the citizens or subjects of other nations, except by special permission of the Government concerned, and it has been increasingly difficult to obtain such permission. The United Kingdom forbade such transfers except with the approval of the board of trade after February 12, 1915, and Belgium, France, Italy, Russia, Austria, Denmark, Brazil, Norway, and Germany passed similar laws the same year. Similar laws were passed in 1916 by Spain, Portugal, the Netherlands, Sweden, and Greece.

Since 1915 the drift has not been from foreign to American register, but from American to foreign register. During the year ended June 30, 1915, only 18,545 gross tons of American vessels were sold to foreigners, while during the year ended June 30, 1916, American vessels sold to foreigners aggregated 102,479 gross tons. From July 1, 1916, to March 3, 1917, returns show the sale of 152 American vessels of 180,612 gross tons to foreigners, of which 76,541 tons were sold to Norwegians, 26,219 to British, 21,992 to French, 14,801 to Japanese, 14,527 to Uruguayans, 7,955 to Dutch, 2,711 to Nicaraguans, 2,119 to Greek, 1,980 to Portuguese, 1,393 to Spanish, 1,366 to Danish, 1,261 to Cubans, 974 to Russians, 496 to Peruvians, 366 to Venezuelans, 349 to Mexicans, 279 to Dominicans, 203 to Costa Ricans, 144 to Haitians, 71 to Panaman, 6 to Swedish, and 4,859 to other foreigners. The sale of American ships to foreigners without the approval of the Shipping Board was prohibited by the proclamation of the President on February 5, 1917.

Respectfully,

WILLIAM C. REDFIELD,
Secretary.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C.

(Inclosure.)

EMPLOYMENT OF ADDITIONAL MESSENGER.

Mr. NELSON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 16), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate is hereby authorized and directed to place on the Senate rolls one additional messenger, at the rate of $1,200 per annum, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided for by law.

Mr. THOMPSON subsequently said: From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably, with amendments, Senate resolution 16, submitted by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] to-day, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Senate by unanimous consent proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendments were, in line 3, before the word "messenger," to strike out the words "one additional" and insert "a"; in the same line, after the word "messenger" to insert "for the minority"; and in line 5, to strike out the words "otherwise provided for by law" and insert "the end of the present fiscal year, June 30, 1917"; so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate is hereby authorized and directed to place on the Senate rolls a messenger for the minority at the rate of $1,200 per annum, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate until the end of the present fiscal year, June 30, 1917.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I am not going to object; I think the minority ought to have this messenger if they want him, but I want to say right here and now that we are passing a great many of these resolutions from time to time, and we are getting the roll filled up with special clerks for Senators and special committees. For instance, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] ought to have had his clerk, and I think the minority should have this one, but not long ago the Appropriations Committee had to go over the entire subject and repeal a great many resolutions which had been introduced in the Senate by different Senators. I hope such matters will usually go to the Appropriations Committee. If these expenses are paid out of the contingent fund, our contingent fund will soon be exhausted.

As I said, I am not going to object, and I think the minority ought to have this man. At the suggestion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], in both these resolutions the time of employment has been limited and fixed for a particular period. That is very wise, because there are several men now on the rolls who were placed there years ago by resolutions that have been lost sight of, and they have held their offices here when the Senators who had them put on the rolls have gone out or died. That is the reason why we should keep in touch with such appointments hereafter. That can be done by appointing them for a certain time, and then the Appropriations Committee can keep up with these officers. There are men sitting around here now who were placed on the rolls under certain resolutions. I think a Senator ought to have what he wants; but I hope that each resolution hereafter will fix a certain, definite time for which the men shall be employed. This the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] has done, and also the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, some weeks ago a special committee was appointed to inquire into the question of additional clerk hire for Senators, and I think that ought to be done. I have felt that a good many Senators do not have the clerks accredited to them that they ought to have. I believe that matter should be taken up promptly.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I think the Senator is right about that; and if Senators who feel that they must have more clerks will write to the Committee on Rules that committee will take up the question and make a report to the Committee on Appropriations, and then in the Committee on Appropriations we can take up the matter when we come to make up the next appropriation bill. What I was speaking of was the loose way we have of putting men on the rolls here at a salary, some getting more than others, and after a time they are lost sight of. If the Senator from Utah and myself had not investigated the matter the men would have stayed on indefinitely. We got to investigating and found these resolutions, some of them passed years ago, putting these men on the rolls. There are two or three of them there now. We are trying to keep in touch with them; but the Appropriations Committee can not keep in touch with them if resolutions are passed putting men on the rolls for indefinite periods.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator that as long as I am a member of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, after the experience that we have had in the past, I shall never sanction a favorable report to the Senate of a resolution putting a man on the roll to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate "until otherwise provided by law." I shall support whatever particular resolution may be in question, insisting that the employment be limited to a certain time, not longer than a period in which it can be demonstrated whether or not the clerk is really needed. Then, if he is needed, I want him to be appropriated for as all other clerks are.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is just what I called attention to. The Senator being on that committee, I want the new committee that has come in to be informed of the condition of things as it has existed before. It was not so during the time my friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] was chairman of the committee; but the condition ought to be known to the new committee that has been appointed, so that they can take care in the future about these resolutions, so that they will not provide for indefinite employment.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I wish to say that before I presented the report on this resolution I consulted with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], and I understood from him that the minority were entitled to this clerk. We certainly want to be fair and just with the minority. At the suggestion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] the amendment was made which has been agreed to, fixing the time of June 30, 1917.

I wish to say in this connection that as long as I am chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I shall do my utmost to see that these matters are properly taken care of, and that no one gets on the rolls in the manner in which the Senator from North Carolina says they have in the past. There has been no resolution reported so far but what the time has been expressly fixed in the resolution to meet the immediate necessities of the case under consideration.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, although this resolution is a resolution of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], to whom I am very much attached personally and socially, I should hate to see it passed.

The Democratic Party, since it has come into power, has been shamelessly chivalrous about a great many of these things. There are right at the reading desk now, under a Democratic Senate, a Republican personnel kept in office by our good nature, and who were kept in office by having their names put on the permanent roll in the law before we came in. I do not suppose there is another instance in all the history of the world where a deliberative body of one party permitted all of its reading clerks, or substantially all of them, to be of the other party.

Every now and then there comes up some little matter of this sort, proposing to put some Republican by name upon the permanent rolls; and then there comes a resolution like this to start him out for that sort of thing by providing for him from the contingent fund of the Senate temporarily. I hope it will not be done.

Now, there are no nicer fellows in the world than our reading clerks, Mr. Rose and Mr. Crockett, and they are perfectly efficient men. Nobody has anything in the world against them; but we have stood here and allowed you absolutely to control the reading desk of a Democratic Senate, and I think you ought to be a little bit generous to us, and not try to impose upon our good nature by getting men named every now and then. We are going to try to take care of the patronage so that each Senator will have, as nearly as can be, the same patronage. I have been doing my utmost with that aim in view; the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] has been doing his utmost with that aim in view; and I hope this resolution will not pass.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say to the Senator from Mississippi that many years ago, when the Republicans came into control of the organization of the Senate, I found here a Democrat from Maryland who originally owed his appointment to Senator Gorman. He was in the air; he had no one to take charge of him or to stand for him. His name was Maryman. He is now on the elevator here. I took him as a part of my patronage. Mr. Maryman is charged to me, I believe. I was told by the Senator from North Carolina that he was charged to me to this day. He has been here 22 or 23 years. During the entire Republican administration, when we had control of the Senate, he stood charged to me, and I kept him in his place. In view of that fact, I trust the Senators on the other side will have a little of the milk of human kindness about this matter.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me just a moment?

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I happen to know about the Maryman case, and I happen to know about the generous and chivalrous conduct of the Senator from Minnesota in connection with Sam Maryman. We are going to relieve you of that situation. We propose to do that. It has been settled by the patronage committee that we would do that if we could; so we are going to try, and I think we can. I do not know of anything that has happened in my entire career in public that ever seemed more generous and chivalrous than your proposal to take care of Maryman if he was not taken care of in some other way and to take it out of your own patronage. If you will pardon me for saying so, without the slightest blarney in the world—because I am neither an Irishman nor a darkey and hardly ever blarney—it is in keeping with your usual course of conduct; but I hope you will not insist upon this. I think we will relieve you later of the Maryman embarrassment, and then you can take care of yourself.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Mississippi that the Committee on Appropriations found that there were on the rolls of the Senate some three or four employees placed there by resolution of the Senate, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate "until otherwise provided by law." In the last legislative appropriation bill all such resolutions were repealed. Of course, that took from the Committee on Privileges and Elections one employee that Senator Kern had had appointed under a resolution of that sort. We provided here by a special resolution to-day for an extra clerk at $1,200 for that committee for a period of 60 days.

I do not know of any employee of the Senate or of the Government who is named in an appropriation bill now with the single exception of Mr. Rose; and, of course, it was years ago when he was first mentioned. I think 10 years ago there were about six or seven employees named in the legislative appropriation bill. They have all died but Mr. Rose, and his name is still carried in the legislative bill; but that is the only one.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And Mr. Crockett.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. Crockett is not named in the appropriation bill. He is just provided for as the assistant.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think there are a lot of them.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, the Senator is mistaken about that. Now, of course, if the Senate wants to disagree to this resolution, it can do so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator whether a request has been made of the Committee on Rules to supply you with this messenger without adding another to the rolls? I think they will give it to you without adding another to the rolls.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, I do not think so. The position is not provided for in the bill. All the patronage that the minority has is provided for now, as the Senator knows.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But I feel sure that the Committee on Rules can give you an additional messenger out of those that are now on the rolls, and let you fill the position, if you wish.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If we can, we are going to give you just as much patronage as you gave us.

Mr. SMOOT. I think to-day that the Democrats are giving us just the same patronage that we gave them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, then, we are going to give you just as much; and if, following that rule, we can give you this one, we will do it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There are two less Democratic Senators than there were, and that might make it practicable to give it without increasing the rolls at all.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that the patronage which is given to the minority consists of so many elevator men, so many policemen, and six of the pages of the Senate. They are all provided for now on the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator does not understand me. What I mean is this: There are two less Democratic Senators than there were last year, and there is some patronage that has not been absorbed. If you presented your application to the chairman of the Committee on Rules, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], I think it most probable that he could arrange to give you this help without having the contingent fund charged with an additional messenger. Does the force require an additional messenger? If it does, we ought to vote it; if it does not, we ought not.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator from North Carolina if the patronage of the majority is such that he could assign this man to the minority?

Mr. OVERMAN. I think we can. Suppose there is $3,000 left over; you can not divide it among 47 men. I think we will be in a position to give this man to the minority without making any appropriation.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well, if you can assign him to the minority.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; we will just give him to the minority.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I understand there will be no difficulty about it, because the time is named when the appointment shall begin and the time is named when he shall be taken off, and we can let it go as it is. It will have to be done by a resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is this man already on the roll?

Mr. SMOOT. He has been on the roll.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And he was paid out of the contingent fund?

Mr. SMOOT. No; he was provided for in another way. He was with the former Senator from Minnesota, Mr. Clapp.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What I am opposed to is to have him named in the law and to hold on forever.

Mr. SMOOT. He is not named here.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator read the resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. It says:

That the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate is hereby authorized and directed to place on the Senate rolls a messenger for the minority at the rate of $1,200 per annum, to be paid out of the contingent fund until the end of the present fiscal year, June 30, 1917.

There is no name.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let it be adopted.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think we can take care of him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendments proposed by the committee.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

LOBBY INVESTIGATION.

Mr. OVERMAN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 15), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the time by which the Committee on the Judiciary was instructed to report to the Senate on the investigation by a subcommittee thereof authorized under Senate resolution No. 92, Sixty-third Congress, first session, being a resolution instructing them to investigate the charge that a lobby is maintained to influence legislation pending in the Senate, which was heretofore extended by resolutions of June 6 and June 26, 1913, February 19 (calendar day March 3), 1915, and September 1 (calendar day September 6), 1916, be, and the same is hereby, further extended so as to permit the said subcommittee to conclude its investigation of, and the committee to make its report to the Senate on, any matters which have arisen or may arise within the scope of said resolution No. 92, Sixty-third Congress, first session, on or before the 4th day of March, 1919; and that the authority granted under the resolutions of August 9, 1913, October 8 (calendar day October 12), 1914, February 19 (calendar day March 3), 1915, and September 1 (calendar day September 6), 1916, for the incurring and payment of expenses is hereby extended for the same length of time so far as it relates to such investigation and report.

WASHINGTON RAILWAY & ELECTRIC CO.

Mr. HUGHES submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 17) which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Whereas differences have arisen between the Washington Railway & Electric Co. (a street railway corporation in the District of Columbia, created and existing by virtue of the act of Congress approved June 5, 1900), and certain of its employees, by reason of which said employees declared a strike or "walkout" on Monday, March 12, 1917, and withdrew from the service of the company, and

Whereas the failure of the said street railway company and its employees to settle and adjust their differences has caused and is causing great public inconvenience and loss, and

Whereas it is in the interest of the public safety and welfare that the causes of the existing differences between the Washington Railway & Electric Co. and its employees should be ascertained and a means devised, if possible, whereby the same may be justly accommodated: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be appointed by the Presiding Officer of the Senate who are hereby given full authority to investigate the cause or causes which have occasioned the present strike by the said employees of the Washington Railway & Electric Co., and to report the result of its investigation with such recommendations as it may deem proper to make to the Senate at the earliest possible day, and the said committee or subcommittee thereof is hereby given power and authority to summon witnesses, administer oaths, and take testimony under oath as to all matters and things covered by this resolution and to employ such clerical and stenographic assistance as may be necessary in the premises, the expenses of said committee to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

EMPLOYMENT OF ADDITIONAL CLERK.

Mr. THOMPSON. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report back favorably, with an amendment, Senate resolution 12, submitted by Mr. POMERENE on the 14th instant, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment was, in line 5, after the word "Senate," to strike out "until otherwise provided by law" and insert "for the term of two months from March 16, 1917," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the United States Senate be, and it is hereby authorized to employ an additional clerk at the rate of $100 per month, to be paid out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, for the term of two months from March 16, 1917.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

On motion of Mr. LODGE, it was Ordered, That 1,000 copies of Senate Document No. 471, Sixty-third Congress, second session, on the subject of the Panama Canal and our relations with Colombia be printed for the use of the Senate Document Room.

OUR NAVAL PROBLEM.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD an article in the edition of the North American Review for the present month, entitled "Our Naval Problem," by Lieut. Commander Lyman A. Cotten, United States Navy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Connecticut will be complied with.

The article is as follows:

OUR NAVAL PROBLEM.

[By Lieut. Commander Lyman A. Cotten, United States Navy.]

There is probably no considerable faction among the various elements that go to make up the American public that does not now actively or passively favor an adequate navy for our Government. However, as to what constitutes an "adequate" navy there is the greatest divergence of opinion. The peace-at-any-price faction considers a few antiquated gunboats an "adequate" navy, since they can protect our citizens in revolution-ridden ports, or take them away to places of safety. At the other extreme our militaristic faction can see adequacy for us only in a navy more powerful than the navy of any other nation or even any possible combination of nations. Between these two extremes may be found what constitutes in reality a navy adequate to the needs of the United States, i. e., a navy capable of properly performing such duties as may logically fall to the lot of the navy of a rich, careless, and ill-prepared country.

As to what constitutes an adequate navy in the above premise even expert opinions differ, and nonexpert opinions run through the entire gamut from reason and moderation to impracticability and freakishness. One self-appointed authority demands a thousand submarines, and nothing else, to satisfy his idea of adequacy; another a fleet of battle cruisers, or a myriad aircraft.

That our Navy is our first line of defense has been long recognized. Let us see then what we have to expect of our Navy; how important to the country is the duty that may fall to its lot and what would be the probable result of a failure on the part of the Navy to measure up to expectations. In general terms, "What is our naval problem?" We are not so much concerned now with the functions of navies in general, but we are very vitally interested in the practical question as to the function of our own Navy, and, so far as can be deducted from this, its necessary size and its desirable composition.

It is frequently stated, as a broad proposition, that in case of war our Navy must keep our enemy from landing on our shores, at least until we have had time to organize and train an adequate army to meet him when he does land. This statement is frequently followed by another citing the miles of coast line of our country, and comparing it with the coast lines of other countries. This is all very interesting, perhaps, but unfortunately the difficulties of defense can not be measured in miles of coast line, nor does the necessary size or composition of a nation's fleet vary with any known property of its coast line. It is the task of our Navy to keep our shores free of invaders, and more than that, for we can hardly abandon to our enemies from the beginning of the war our outlying dependencies—Porto Rico, the Philippines, and the Hawaiian Islands, not to mention the Panama Canal. The problem that will tax the energies of our Navy in war is to keep our normal naval frontier inviolate, at least in its vital parts.

The naval frontier of a nation may be defined as the geographical sea limit of its military power. It includes, but is not necessarily conterminous with, the coast line of all territory facing the sea that is under the political control of a nation; it matters not whether this territory is contiguous or remote; and it incloses such parts of the sea as are occupied or controlled by its naval forces or are necessary to the military security of its territory.

Under this definition our naval frontier on the Atlantic, beginning near the easternmost point of Maine, sweeps down outside our eastern coast to the straits of Florida, juts out to the eastward around Porto Rico, then back by Jamaica and south to the Panama Canal. Continuing on the Pacific, it stretches out, southward and westward, to the Samoan Islands, on around the Philippines by way of Guam, back to the Midway Islands, up around the Aleutian Islands and north to Behring Strait. Of course, this frontier includes certain territory not under the political control of the United States, but its relations to the United States are such as to place it, navally, in a special category. Without in any way anticipating or desiring political control of any territory between the Rio Grande and the Panama Canal, all of this territory falls within our naval frontier for defensive purposes and as herein defined. In other words, it is as vital in a naval sense to keep an enemy out of Mexico as out of Texas.

It may interest those fond of comparing miles of coast line and other purely physical properties to point out that our naval frontier extends from longitude 65° west to 120° east, approximately half way around the world, and in latitude it extends from 18° south to 70° north. The length of this naval frontier of ours is approximately 21,000 miles, a distance that makes our extensive coast line seem scarcely more than a Sabbath day's journey.

A nation's naval frontier is exposed to the military force of all other nations touching the sea, for only the high seas intervene and these are free to all those that can maintain their rights thereto. At one time distance was reckoned on as a considerable factor in defense, but to-day the sea is a convenience rather than a barrier, unless the way be barred by naval power. Extreme distance, it is true, introduces difficulties, but so long as these may be overcome it is extremely unwise to count upon mere distance from possible enemies as an element of actual strength. When the difficulties of distance have been overcome, force is applied as though these difficulties had never existed.

We see that for an enemy to reach us he must penetrate our naval frontier—the danger to our two land frontiers may for the moment be disregarded—and so long as we can keep it intact we not only prevent invasion of our home shores but also keep our possessions from falling into the hands of an enemy. Thus the maximum that we can demand of our Navy, whatever its size or composition, is the preservation of our naval frontier inviolate. Let us see how much of a problem this involves, and from this deduce the size and composition of the Navy needed to handle adequately this problem.

Before considering our naval frontier, as it is to-day, let us for a moment look at it as it was in 1898, before the "hand of destiny," imperialism, or common sense, as you choose, stepped in and stretched it to the east around Porto Rico, to the west around the Philippines and other Pacific islands, and to the south around Panama: Then it merely skirted our coast line in a modest and unassuming manner, and only struck into remote waters as it rounded Alaska. This may be termed our coast-line naval frontier, and its problems were simple compared with the problems of our present far-flung naval frontier, joining the new West with the old East, the Tropics with the Frigid Zone. This may be termed our naval frontier of destiny, or simply our naval frontier, for this is the one with which we are now concerned, the one the defense of which constitutes our problem.

It will be apparent to the most untrained military eye that our present naval frontier is far more difficult to defend than our former one. Destiny does not confer unmixed blessings, and one can not enjoy increased authority and opportunity without shouldering additional responsibility.

Other things being equal, an exposed or projecting portion of a military area is the more vulnerable part, and the same is true in naval warefare. This is because such a part is less easily supported or succored by other parts, is more detached physically, is more accessible to an enemy, and is farthest removed from the main sources of friendly supply, both of men and material. If the vulnerable part be also an area desired by an enemy, by virtue of location, trade possibilities, or strategic reasons, the danger of its vulnerability being tested is, of course, vastly increased. Also if through such an area another and more important one may be reached more easily, the first becomes increasingly desirable for an enemy; the question of its defense involves both areas equally and the vulnerable one can not be abandoned without involving the other.

With these few elementary principles, and without attempting to investigate extensively the offensive and defensive characteristics or the complications of naval strategy, let us look at our naval frontier. We find an exposed area in the Atlantic, another in the Pacific, and a third where the Atlantic and Pacific are joined by the Panama Canal. These three areas, Porto Rico, Panama, and the Philippines, are thrust forward, as it were, and are remote, as compared with adjacent areas, from the strengthening bases of our mainland; they are all most valuable commercially, as well as strategically, and they are in many ways most enticing to an enemy. Alaska is also exposed geographically, but climate and physical characteristics are a bulwark of defense, and this area is not in the same category as the other three we have mentioned.

In the Atlantic the Porto Rico region and the adjoining Panama region together form the Caribbean area, that frequent scene of maritime warfare and fruitful field for easy spoils since the days of Drake and Raleigh. This is an area of great interest to many nations, and one in which a number of European nations have territory.

It may be noted how our naval frontier skirts the shores of Jamaica, so aptly termed by Admiral Mahan "The Key of the Caribbean," and how other European-owned islands extend to the southward and eastward from the very shores of Porto Rico. All of this tends to complicate matters from our point of view, and, together with our avowed purpose of maintaining the countries bordering on the Caribbean free from the political control of European nations, makes of the Caribbean an area of paramount importance to us from every point of view. The fate of the Monroe doctrine and the control of the Panama Canal may be said to center in our ability to maintain inviolate our naval frontier in the Caribbean area. Incidentally it may be pointed out that the fate of the Monroe doctrine will be determined by the nation that controls the Panama Canal, to stand if that nation so desires, to fall if it so wills. This and other more generally recognized functions makes of the Panama Canal itself a prize of the first magnitude that would give the highest strategic value to the surrounding area.

The exposed area in the Pacific, the Philippine-Guam area, has not for us perhaps the vital interest that the Caribbean has, but it is not devoid of value for us and appeals with particular force to some other powers. It occupies an important, if not a commanding, position in the Orient and its influence can not safely be ignored by us. Still it is a long way from our home shores, and our far eastern interest is, after all, very largely one of sympathy. We speak of our trade with the Orient, but it is so small a fraction of our whole trade that its loss would scarcely be missed, and we do nothing year after year to increase it. These few passing thoughts are prompted by the inevitable query as to whether our interests really justify us in attempting to maintain our naval frontier almost to the shores of China. However, this is a question for the people of our democracy to settle.

We see from our cursory glance at our naval frontier that we have three areas of natural vulnerability, one in the east, one in the west, and one in the south. In reality there are but two separate areas, since the Panama Canal and the Porto Rico region merge into one, as they stand or fall together. These areas, for the reasons briefly stated above, may be considered as naturally the weakest part in our naval frontier. This natural weakness, of course, may be counteracted by artificial aids to defense; and these are what we are now seeking in general terms.

Do our people wish to abandon either or both of the naturally vulnerable areas in our naval frontier in case of war? If so, we need not take into consideration the defense of these areas in attempting to determine what constitutes an adequate navy for our country. The Caribbean area is so intimately connected with our country, is so close to our shores, and is so rich in possibilities that it seems hardly necessary to consider the voluntary abandoning of it. It may be mentioned that this area in the possession of some other power would constitute a menace to our actual coast line that could be met only by greater defensive measures than are now needed to safeguard the area in question. From what we have said of naval frontiers it should be apparent to anyone that with our naval frontier contracted to our frontier of 1898, and the Caribbean in the control of possible enemies, Florida at once becomes our exposed area, with possible threatening positions in close proximity thereto. Also with our abandonment of the Caribbean area would go the loss of the canal, unless we had power enough subsequently to retake a large portion. It is safe to say that our people wish the Caribbean area defended to the last resource.

As to the Philippine area, the wishes of our people are not so easily deduced from reason. Of that portion of our people that is not absolutely indifferent, it is probable that the majority would see us abandon the area in question with absolute equanimity. Certainly we have known now for 17 years that this region would be a source of weakness to us in war, and it is no violation of confidence to say that we have done but little to correct that condition. To save a possibly long and profitless inquiry that at the end would probably lead to nothing definite, let us assume that we are willing to fall back in the Pacific to the Aleutian Island-Hawaii-Panama line. This shortens up our naval frontier immensely and brings it in nearer to our coast line, yet does not omit anything of vital importance to our country.

What constitutes a navy "adequate" for the defense of the retracted frontier that we have here sketched? This, in a democracy, each man may decide for himself and may back his decision with all the force that is his, but it would seem the part of wisdom for each citizen to demand that the trained experts of the Government work out the details of such a decision for him, and that the proper branch of the Government be forced by popular will to see these details authorized and executed.

The following may be taken as the outline of an adequate Navy, based upon the defensive demands of our naval frontier. It makes no claims to being authoritative, and reasons can necessarily be given but briefly. At any rate, it is founded upon certain military principles that are thought to be correct, and it does not claim to be the only possible answer that will meet the conditions of adequacy.

First, we will have to indicate what we conceive to be the constituent parts of a Navy, since these are not generally recognized in our country. In America prospective naval effectiveness is measured in dreadnaughts, or great guns, or total tonnage, but all of these are utterly false standards of measurement. War efficiency is primarily a question of men, not of material. What men are to business and success ashore, so are the officers and men of the Navy to the business of the Navy, which ultimately means victory.

In discussions of our Navy in print, on the platform and in Congress itself the question of personnel is rarely mentioned, and personnel is always the last element provided in "increase of the Navy." Yet since man first went to sea in rough "dugouts," sea battles have been decided by personnel and not by material.

Besides personnel, a navy consists of many classes of ships, with their various weapons, and of bases from which they can operate and to which they can return for repairs and replenishment. Each class of ship has its own function to perform in the complicated business of war on the sea, and in many cases the function of one is as different from that of the other as are the functions of the five human senses. As a dumb man may converse on his fingers, so in some cases may one class of ships take the place of another, but a makeshift is never so effective as the real thing. The advocates of submarines only, or aircraft alone, must realize that they are viewing but one pattern in the rug of naval warfare, and the whole is made up of many complicated patterns.

The most pressing need of our Navy is increased personnel, both commissioned and enlisted, and this is regardless of whether there is any further increase of ships. The ratio of personnel to ship displacement is dangerously small even now, and it is more important to keep this ratio sufficient than it is to add new guns or new submarines. With the personnel-displacement ratio too small, the work of preparation for war piles up ahead, instead of being completed in the present, until those responsible (every person in the Navy in his own sphere) are borne down physically and in spirit.

Let us see what our Navy needs particularly to protect its Atlantic naval frontier. If we wish to hold our position in the Porto Rico-Panama region, we need, and need badly, a first-class naval base in that area. We have an excellent location for such a base at Guantanamo and have had it since 1898, but the naval base is not there. Nature has done its part, but the size and location of appropriations would seem to be determined by other than strategic reasons. We knowingly accept a big handicap in the defense of this region so long as we have there no first-class naval base.

In the Pacific we will consider as abandoned from the outbreak of war all regions between our present naval frontier and the Aleutian-Hawaiian-Panama Line. It is better to be prepared to do this than to attempt to hold the more extended line with insufficient power. On our modified frontier we have been more provident than in the West Indies, for here we have the beginnings of a first-class base.

Now, to defend our frontier we need three fleets: An Atlantic Fleet, a Caribbean Fleet, and a Pacific Fleet, and the three should be approximately of the same composition. In case of war in the Atlantic, the Atlantic and Caribbean Fleets would work together and the Pacific Fleet would be drawn upon and handled as the Pacific problem permitted. In case of war in the Pacific, the Caribbean Fleet would pass through the canal to the Pacific, and the Atlantic Fleet would be drawn upon and handled as the Atlantic problem permitted.

The composition of each of these three fleets should be such that by a junction of two of them we could hope to meet, with fair prospect of victory, any force that could in reason be brought to bear against our naval frontier. This condition would seem to be met by a main fighting strength, for each fleet of two squadrons of dreadnaughts, and one of battle cruisers, each squadron composed of nine ships; one fast scout for each dreadnaught to locate the enemy and work with destroyers, and two destroyers for each capital ship.

When this ideal is attained, if ever, we could bring to bear in either ocean a minimum effective fleet of 36 dreadnaughts, 18 cruiser battleships, 36 scouts, and 108 destroyers. Of course, in addition to these there should be a more or less extensive fleet of auxiliaries, fuel ships, ammunition ships, food ships, repair ships, hospital ships, mine layers, transports, tugs, and tenders.

There remains to be determined the number of submarines and aircraft needed to complete our defense. The scope of activity of naval aircraft is still largely problematical, but we are safe in assuming that we need at least two effective machines for each scout and that probably three machines are necessary to insure that one may always be effective. This would give us in all a very modest air fleet of 324 machines, or an effective fleet at all times of 108 machines.

When we come to discuss submarines we take up a vast subject. Much that has to do with submarines is confidential, much is guesswork, and much is faith. Yet no one denies that they are a powerful and increasingly influential weapon of warfare, but chiefly in defense. Submarines should not be required or expected to work continuously, and probably one day in three on duty is sufficiently taxing.

If one will glance at our naval frontier, he will see behind it at various places points of manifest strategic value, as New York Harbor, Delaware Bay, etc. Each of these points should at all times be covered by not less than three submarines, which will make nine, based on each of these strategic points, that could come out when summoned to actual attack. Of these strategic points that really go to make up our naval frontier—leaving out Guam and the Philippines—there are 20, which gives us for our required number of submarines 180.

The outline here given of what constitutes for us an adequate Navy may seem to many Americans extreme, but there is only one standard of comparison for navies, and that is other navies.

ARTICLE BY SYDNEY BROOKS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I find another article in the same magazine by Sydney Brooks, on "How to raise armies: A lesson for America from British experience." I ask that this article may also be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

HOW TO RAISE ARMIES: A LESSON FOR AMERICA FROM BRITISH EXPERIENCE.

[By Sydney Brooks.]

The imminent possibility of a war with Germany imposes upon the United States the necessity of testing very thoroughly her military organization and of assimilating and applying the lessons of the European struggle. In this article I propose to show, by particular reference to Great Britain, the scope and character of just one of those lessons—the lesson of how to raise, and incidentally also of how not to raise, the largest armies that a commercial and nonmilitary nation can produce.

The United States has much to learn from all the belligerents, but most of all from Great Britain, and if and when Americans are forced, as we in England were forced in 1914, to fight a sudden and supreme fight for national existence, to gather up all their resources of men and material, transform them to military uses, and hurl them in a single thunderbolt against a long-prepared enemy, it is to British experience in the present war that they will turn both for the guidance and for the warnings to be extracted from it. That is not because Great Britain has managed her part in the war with a faultless and mechanical perfection. Her people have, indeed, accomplished marvels. In less than two and a half years they have built up a military organization which in efficiency and equipment equals, if it does not surpass, the machine that it took the Germans 40 years of unswerving effort to construct. But though the achievements that stand to the credit of the British side of the account are prodigious and indisputable, they might have been attained more expeditiously and with a much smaller expenditure of money and energy. Great Britain has had to grope her way, painfully, with many stumblings and strayings, to that summit of power which is now securely in her possession. But therein, precisely, lies the value of her record to Americans. You can learn from her successes; you can learn almost as much from her mistakes.

If I were an American—and the past 20 years have made me very largely one in sympathy and sentiment—I should be inclined to urge, as the first step toward national preparedness, a thorough study of British problems and performances since August, 1914. For in the fundamental conditions that determine a country's attitude toward war and its capacity to wage it, Great Britain and the United States are so similar as to be virtually one and the same land. Neither nation is organized for war, as Prussia, for instance, has been organized for the past hundred and fifty years. Neither nation regards war as the chief end of its existence. Neither in normal times and as a regular item in its policy enjoys universal military service. Both are busy, commercial democracies, armed for defense, but meditating no aggression upon any other power, with a strong bias of individualism in their composition, much more concerned with the factory than with the camp, firm in their attachment to representative and responsible government, suspicious of all State control and particularly suspicious of anything that tends to exalt the military over the civil power. Both have been accustomed to rely for their protection upon a small efficient professional army, with larger but much less highly trained reserves of militia in the background.

We in Great Britain found in 1914 when the storm broke upon us how utterly inadequate was such provision to the demands of modern war and that nothing less than the arraying of the entire nation in arms would meet the needs of the crisis. Were a similar crisis to confront Americans they too would make the same discovery. They too would have to face on the spur of the moment the vast and varied problems of enrolling and training the whole manhood of the country. In that event I hope they would duplicate our triumphs while avoiding our blunders. I hope they would profit by our experience instead of by their own errors. Indeed, I cherish a greater hope than that. There is no reason why Americans should not apply the lessons taught them by Great Britain in such a way that even the gravest emergency will find them ready to cope with it, fortified with ample knowledge of how to set about the business, provided beforehand with a plan of action and the necessary machinery for its execution. We were caught two and a half years ago largely, grievously, unprepared. An Englishman can have no dearer wish than that Americans should never find themselves in any such predicament. They need not unless they wish to. With a little forethought, a little application, a little energy, a little common sense, they can succeed, not only where we succeeded but also where we failed.

In this article I propose to bring out, if I can, some of the lessons to be learned from the tale of British recruiting. When the war broke out the utmost we could put into the field was 550,000 men. The regular army, with its reserves, accounted for 300,000, and the territorial force, corresponding to the American National Guard, only partially trained and not liable, except as volunteers, for foreign service, contributed a further 250,000. But of these 550,000 men over 100,000 were serving in India or other foreign stations. For the defense of the United Kingdom, consequently, and for the dispatch of an expeditionary force, only about 400,000 men were available, more than half of whom were not fully trained. And not only was our army a small one but it had no arrangements for expansion.

Its recruiting machinery and personnel barely sufficed to collect the customary annual quota of 30,000 recruits. Indeed only a month before the outbreak of the war the military authorities were solemnly debating how best to improve the methods of obtaining these 30,000 a year. The recruiting offices were as a rule hidden away in poky back streets, with one medical officer in attendance; and an elaborate series of questions had to be administered, and a prodigious number of forms filled up, and each new recruit was compelled to have a bath before the King's shilling was handed to him and he became a duly enrolled member of His Majesty's forces. In those leisurely days some 500 persons comprised the total recruiting staff of the country. To-day there are all but 7,000 engaged on nothing else. Great Britain declared war on Tuesday, August 4. On the previous Saturday the officer in charge of Great Scotland Yard, the principal recruiting office in London, attested only eight men. On Sunday and on Monday the office was closed. On Tuesday he found a seething mass of men outside the doors and it took nearly half an hour and 20 policemen to force a path to his desk.

For the whole of that day and for many days to come he was attesting men as hard as he could. So it was all over Great Britain. Men waited in thousands under a broiling sun the whole day long for their turn to come and were then, as often as not, told to come again next day. In the country districts they walked 20 miles and more to the nearest recruiting station and after enlisting would quietly lie down in a ditch for the night. Lord Kitchener on August 8 called for 100,000 volunteers. He got them in a fortnight. Instead of 30,000 recruits in a year more than that rolled in in a single day. In the fifth week of the war 175,000 enlisted for the regular army alone; many more joined the territorials; and the full total of those who offered themselves in that one week can hardly have been less than 250,000.

Naturally the old machinery for recruiting broke down. But civilian volunteers quickly rushed to the rescue. Members of Parliament, armed with a scrap of Lord Kitchener's handwriting, spread over the country, assuming unheard-of responsibilities, turning the city halls into recruiting offices, engaging the necessary doctors out of hand, abolishing one by one the old formalities of enrollment, and improvising accommodation and a comissariat for the attested recruits, and explaining the cause for which Great Britain was fighting to huge and excited audiences. Getting the men, it was soon seen, was easy enough. Indeed, it was fatally easy.

The preparations that had been made and the reserves of material that had been accumulated on the basis of the prewar establishment proved utterly inadequate to feed, house, clothe, equip, arm, and drill these scores and hundreds of thousands of new recruits. The food was to be had, indeed, but there was no machinery for its proper distribution; there were no barracks, no huts, no tents to deal with so huge a host; the most essential items in their equipment would have required under normal conditions years to produce, and even under the highest pressure could not be turned out at anything like the rate at which the men were coming forward; and as nearly all the officers and noncommissioned officers of the regular army had left for the front there was next to nobody available for the drilling and training of the new army. Very much the same situation arose in the American Civil War. Flooded with far more men than he could handle, Stanton at the end of the first year of the war stopped recruiting and dispersed his staff. It was a suicidal policy, but we came near to repeating it in England two years ago.

The war office did not actually put up the shutters of the recruiting offices, but on September 11, being at its wits' end how to deal with the 500,000 men who had then joined up, it raised the standard for recruits. The device was but too successful. In the first week of its adoption the number of recruits for the regular army fell to less than a third of the figures for the previous week. A little later they were less than a ninth. But the falling off of recruits was only part of the evil. The nation got it into its head that enough had been done, that the war office was satisfied and that no more men were needed. The splendid enthusiasm of the opening days and weeks of the war was severely checked and its subsequent restoration required a titanic effort.

The second phase of recruiting in Great Britain is really the history of this effort. When the primal instinctive rush to the colors had been deliberately dammed by the war office the people rather tended to infer that in this as in previous wars Great Britain's main functions would be not to supply fighting men but to keep the seas and furnish the allies with the sinews of war.

The country, it must be remembered, had never known conscription; it was not invaded; there was little to bring the war visibly home to it; and the sluggish, unrealizing cast of the national temperament made it difficult for the mind to grasp what the eyes did not see. On the morrow of some German atrocity, like the bombardment of undefended ports, there was always a big flow of men into the recruiting offices; but though the standard of height and chest measurement and physical fitness was lowered in October and the age limit extended, and no further step was taken to limit the number of volunteers, it was clear that a special campaign would be needed if the nation was to put forth its full strength. This campaign was undertaken by the united organizations of all the political parties. They deluged the country with speakers; they covered the wall with posters; they filled the newspapers with advertisements; they sent out something like 8,000,000 letters of appeal; they utilized the services of wounded men home from the front; they turned the cinematograph into a most effective agency; they organized recruiting bands and parades; they conducted, in short, a campaign that was more like an American presidential election than anything that had ever been seen in Britain.

Over 54,000,000 posters and leaflets were issued, over 12,000 meetings held, over 20,000 speeches delivered. Meanwhile cities and counties and private individuals began raising local battalions, making themselves responsible for the clothing, feeding, housing, and initial training of the units, subject, of course, to future reimbursement by the War Office. These local battalions, each recruited from its own neighborhood, caught the popular imagination and evoked an immense amount of local patriotism. No less than 243 of them have been raised, including a whole division of "bantams" of men, that is, between 5 feet and 5 feet 3 inches in height, who had hitherto been excluded from the army.

By these methods more than 2,000,000 men had been enlisted within a year from the beginning of the war. But they were wasteful methods. They were wasteful because they were indiscriminate. They made no distinction between the men who ought to be in the army and the men who would be more usefully employed in making munitions, on the railways, on the farms, or in industries that it was vital to maintain if the national wealth was to stand the strain of the war.

It was to bring about a more judicious and a better organized system of recruiting, as well as to tabulate all our remaining resources of man and woman power, that the national registration act was passed in July, 1915. Under its terms not only had the actual occupation of every male and female between the ages of 15 and 65 to be declared, but also their capacity for any other business which might be serviceable to the country. More than 150,000 volunteers, mostly women, quickly offered themselves for the work of collecting the cards and checking and collating the information contained in them; and in a very few weeks and without a single hitch or the creation of any new machinery a complete survey had been made of the whole country and of every man and woman in it between 15 and 65. At the same time, various committees were busily at work weighing the comparative needs of the army, munition works, and agriculture and other civil industries. Their recommendations, when placed side by side with the results of the registration, made it possible to draw up lists of trades in the order of their national importance, and to decide in the case of some of them that no workers, even though of military age, should be drafted from them into the army. These trades were known as "reserved occupations" and the registration cards of the men employed in them were "starred" as a precaution against their being taken away for other purposes.

Everything was now complete for a final effort of the voluntary system. Each recruiting office was supplied with the registration cards giving the names and addresses and occupations of all the men of military age in its district. There was a great outburst of posters and advertisements on the boardings; the party organizations redoubled their activities; recruiting marches, composed of troops of all arms, headed by the regimental bands, paraded the country, one of them, and an extremely successful one, being no less than 8,000 strong; the Germans came opportunely to the assistance of the War Office by a series of Zeppelin raids; and Lord Derby was appointed director general of recruiting. Lord Derby's outstanding innovation was the system of group recruiting. Those who wanted to enlist at once were still allowed to do so. Those who preferred merely to attest their willingness to fight if called upon and in the meantime to remain undisturbed in their civil employments were immediately placed in the reserve under one of 46 groups according to their age and married or single state—the first 23 groups consisting of single men between the ages of 18 and 41, a group for each year, and the second 23 groups being similarly allocated to married men.

By this arrangement the war office could always reckon on being able to call up a given number of recruits just as and when it wanted them. Two stipulations were attached to Lord Derby's campaign. One was that if it failed after a two months' trial to produce enough men for the army's needs some form of compulsory service would be introduced. The other was that no married men were to be called up until the groups of single men had been exhausted, and that if the single men were found not to have attested in satisfactory numbers compulsion would be applied to them before the married volunteers were summoned to the colors.

On December 11, 1915, after two months of incessant effort, the lists were formally closed. The campaign had proved a big success. It had brought 275,000 men directly into the army; it had induced 2,250,000 men to attest their readiness to join up when called upon. But it had also shown that a considerable number of single men of military age had neither attested nor enlisted.

A bill was rapidly passed through Parliament in January of last year applying compulsion to these reluctant bachelors; but before it was put into operation the group tests were reopened, a great rush of recruits followed, and comparatively few single men were left to be gathered in by compulsion. The principle of compulsion, however, having thus been established, it was only a question of time before it was enforced universally. On May 25 all men between ages of 18 and 41 in Great Britain became liable for military service. At the same time tribunals were set up in every recruiting area to pass upon individual cases, to decide, for instance, whether a given individual for business or family reasons was not entitled to temporary or permanent exemption; to examine, or rather to reexamine, the position of the men in the "reserved occupations"; to hear the pleadings of the conscientious objectors who, however, in spite of the attention they have attracted, only number 2 per cent of the total claimants for exemption; and to comb out all the employees, manual or clerical, in industry or the Government offices or anywhere else whose work could be done at a pinch by boys or women or men above military age.

There are nearly 1,500 of these tribunals in Great Britain. They are all composed of busy men who receive no pay and precious few thanks for their unenviable but most necessary labors. On the whole they have deservedly earned the confidence of the country. Only about 4 per cent of their decisions have been appealed against; and they are still at work putting the finishing touches to their task of distributing the burden of military service as widely and equitably as possible. But it is worth noting that before either they or the compulsory system came into existence over 5,000,000 men, or more than 11 per cent of the total population of the British Isles, had voluntarily joined the army—a record of patriotic eagerness and sacrifice unparalleled, I believe, in the history of any land. It seems probable that, with the additional numbers brought in by conscription, at least 6,500,000 men of the United Kingdom will have served with the colors before the war is over.

The lessons to be derived from such a record lie on its face. It was our great fault in Great Britain that we had never thought out the recruiting problem in advance and that the war found us utterly ignorant of the number of eligible men that we might reasonably hope to enlist. That, I say, was a grave fault. But it will be nothing less than a crime if the United States duplicates our error.

There is no clearer injunction laid upon Americans by British experience than this—that they should take stock of their man power betimes; that they should know beforehand how many men at a time of crisis would be at their disposal. If I were an American I should certainly seek to lay the foundations of preparedness by urging upon both the State and the Federal Governments the necessity for a census of all the able-bodied men between 18 and 41, with a list of their occupations. In no other way, as we have found in Great Britain, can recruiting proceed on a scientific basis and a just proportion be observed between the claims of the Army and the claims of industry. To enlist everybody who offers himself and who is physically fit means in practice crippling trades that are vital to victory. I do not know exactly how many men we have had to discharge from the army simply because, however excellent they were as soldiers, they were still more useful to the Nation as foremen and skilled artisans; but they can hardly by now be less than 60,000.

It was not until we got the national-registration act, nearly a year after the commencement of the war, that the waste and misdirection of energy involved in training men to fight who had afterwards to be reinstated in their civilian occupations was obviated. Were each State in the American Union to pass a registration act of its own, to prepare, in other words, and to keep up to date, a muster roll of its potential recruits, the main difficulty in the way of raising, if necessary, an American army of 10,000,000 men would be removed. You would know where you were; each State could tell almost at a glance which men could be spared for the Army and which ought to be retained in the trades that support the main fabric of the Nation's commerce or furnish the infinitely varied paraphernalia of modern war; you would obtain, in short, a bird's-eye view of the whole situation. That preliminary survey, if British experience goes for anything, is absolutely indispensable when there is any question of recruiting men on so large a scale as to affect the proper balance between military and industrial needs. Without it you lose time—and time is the most precious of military commodities; you squander energy—and energy in a life-and-death struggle is precisely what you can not afford to squander; you grope and fumble in the dark when the imperative necessities of the hour call for brisk and confident progress in the light; you take steps that have afterwards to be retraced; you do work merely to find yourself later on compelled to undo it; you bungle a business that with a little prevision you might have dispatched with a clear-cut swiftness and efficiency.

I doubt whether there is to-day a single Englishman who would not assert that for a country like the United States the first and essential starting point in any program of preparedness is the compilation of a roster that will show at once the numbers, addresses, and occupation of all the men of military age in each State. The information thus collected would naturally and automatically find its way to the War Department, there to be studied and classified. And it would be no small gain if the Federal Government lent its assistance by adding military statistics to the other objects fulfilled by the decennial census returns. In Great Britain, at any rate, I shall hope to see the day when special cards to be filled up by all men of military age are sent to every household in the land whenever a national census is taken.

Another lesson that is very forcibly impressed by British experience is that recruiting is or should be a civilian business. That is to say, the military should prescribe the general terms and conditions of enlistment, but the actual raising of the volunteer armies should be left in civilian hands. Americans in this respect have a very great advantage over the people of Great Britain in the fact that theirs is a Federal system of Government, that each State is a self-contained entity, and that the natural recruiting sergeants of the country are the 48 governors of the States, who have at their instant command not only all the necessary local knowledge and experiecne but also the machinery of administration. Were I an American I should most strongly urge upon the governor of my State the necessity of preparing a plan of recruiting without one day's delay. Such a plan would include, first, the selection of the most prominent buildings in the cities and villages as recruiting stations; secondly, the designation and enrollment of an adequate staff of doctors and clerks; thirdly, the choice—in consultation, of course, with the military authorities—of sites for camps and training grounds; fourthly, the registration of the local firms that could be depended upon to furnish huts, tents, and food supplies; and fifthly, a survey of the private dwelling houses adjacent to each camp on which recruits could be immediately billeted. With the ground plan thus completed, all the rest would follow in orderly sequence.

If it were necessary, for instance, as we found it to be in Great Britain, to explain the issues to the people and to rouse their patriotic enthusiasm, an American governor, using the unequaled organization of the political parties throughout his State and having within arm's reach the most expert writers of advertisements and designers of telling posters in the world, would quickly achieve results that would throw our British efforts into the shade. And just as the War Department would throw upon the governors of the States the main responsibility for recruiting, so the governors of the States, if they had profited by British example, would pass it on as much as possible to the mayors of the various towns. A measured devolution is the essence of successful recruiting, and the most fruitful plan that can be adopted is that which enlists troops on a strictly territorial basis, so that men of the same neighborhood train and fight together, which elicits the greatest amount of local interest, and which encourages wealthy men to raise at their own initial expense special battalions in their own localities.

But all recruiting is conditioned by two factors. The first factor is the supply of officers. The second is the supply of armaments. It is of no use enlisting men by the hundreds of thousands unless there are officers to train them and rifles and other equipment ready for their use. If the civilian authorities hand over to the military authorities more men than the latter can possibly absorb and turn to account, the result is a breakdown. That, as I have described, was what happened to Great Britain. To get round it we adopted the disastrous expedient of checking enlistment by artificial expedients, with the consequence that an immense effort was subsequently necessary to start the flow of recruits again. There is a much better way. It is the way that we ultimately adopted ourselves, and that Americans, I think, would do well to copy. It consists in accepting every fit man who comes forward but in not calling him to the colors until he is wanted, until, that is, the military are ready to receive him. The moment he enlists and the doctors have certified him as sound, he becomes a soldier and receives a soldier's pay. But instead of instantly entraining him for the nearest camp or depot, he is sent back to his civilian employment and told to remain in it until the military authorities need him.

The system works very smoothly. It is decided, for instance, that the military organization in New York State is in a position to handle 100,000 recruits. When that total is reached men ought not to be, as they were in Great Britain, discouraged from enlisting. On the contrary, the door should remain wide open and every inducement held out to enter it. But those who do so should be placed on the active reserve, sent home, urged to resume their normal life, and wait until a summons from the commanding officer tells them that they are wanted. In this way the disturbance to civil life and business is reduced to a minimum and the military authorities are enabled to cut their coat according to their cloth, to plan ahead, and to take stock from day to day of the resources at their disposal. In no other way, indeed, can recruiting in an unprepared nation that does not possess a system of universal service and that is called upon to develop its utmost fighting power on the spur of the moment—in no other way can it proceed without an infinity of waste, confusion, and needless dislocation. We have paid in Great Britain during the past two and a half years a heavy and bitter price to assimilate that simple fact.

With the well-nigh innumerable problems involved in producing munitions and material on the scale demanded by modern war—problems on which British experience throws a light of the highest power—I can not deal in this article. But there is one factor intimately connected with recruiting on which a word or two should be said—I mean the supply of officers and their training. We were badly off in both respects in Great Britain when the war broke out. Outside the regular army, which, of course, was dispatched to the front, and the territorials, we had very few officers, and such as we had, while keen and intelligent, knew next to nothing of what soldiering was. What saved the situation was the officers' training corps, founded by Lord Haldane, and attached to practically all our universities and our great public schools. The officers who were members of or had graduated from these training corps and had then passed into civil life knew, at any rate, the rudiments of drill; and with the help of retired noncommissioned officers and a few officers on the active list of the regular army and a considerable array of dugouts they proceeded to put the new armies through their paces. But so engrossing was this work that they had no chance of carrying on their own military education.

Until the end of 1914 there was practically no training whatever for the officers of the new armies. The first batch were put through a month's hurried course, but even this had to be dropped, so urgent and overriding was the necessity of licking the raw recruits into some sort of shape. Gradually schools for the instruction of officers in musketry, signaling, telephone, engineering for trench work, and the use of grenades, mortars, and machine guns began to spring up. But it was not until the opening of the year 1916 that their training was thoroughly organized. No officer now gets a commission unless he has served six weeks in the ranks. Then he goes to a cadet corps for four months. After that he is posted to his unit for three months. The most efficient men are then sent to a senior officers' corps for a further three months. It is only, in short, after a year's severe training that a lieutenant is now considered fit to go to the front in charge of his men. In all this, I imagine, there is more than one hint that Americans might usefully bear in mind, and more than one question they would do well to revolve.

What steps, in particular, are being taken by the American universities and by the large private schools that have become in recent years so distinctive a feature of American education to establish officers' training corps and to instruct the youth of the country in the elements of soldiering I do not know. But I do know that if, when your time comes and you have to grapple with the tremendous task of raising armies that run into millions, you are forced to depend for their training upon the officers of the Regular Army and the National Guard and have no outside source of supply, it will go desperately hard with you. And I also know that, short of universal service, there is no factor in preparedness more vital than the steady pouring forth from the schools and universities of batches of young men who are not unversed in the duties of an officer and who are ready, when the call upon them is made, to take charge of hastily raised recruits with everything to learn and turn them into soldiers.

TREATY WITH COLOMBIA.

On motion of Mr. STONE, the injunction of secrecy was removed from the separate views submitted by Mr. PITTMAN on the 16th instant pertaining to the treaty with Colombia for the settlement of differences with that country (printed as a part of Ex. H., 63d Cong., 2d sess.), and they were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEPARATE VIEWS OF MR. PITTMAN.

As a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations who participated in the favorable report of the majority, I am unwilling through silence to appear to admit that the construction placed upon such report by the minority in the views printed and submitted by them is either an accurate presentation of the reasons or a fair suggestion of the motives that urged me to join in the recommendation that the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the Colombian treaty.

The statement in the report that "In all of these treaties the United States, out of the desire to settle the controversy, has offered to make recompense to Colombia by way of satisfaction for her claim for damages" is unfortunate, as it is possible of misinterpretation, as is demonstrated by the report of the minority.

It is true that Colombia for 14 years has contended that the United States did her a grevious wrong in the matter of the Panama revolution, and for such wrong she has claimed damages. It is also true that a controversy has and does now exist by reason of such contention and claim. Whilst our Government has never admitted the contentions of Colombia, it has for several years conceded the good faith underlying the controversy and has made several efforts to settle such controversy in a spirit of compromise without a determination of the questions involved and without admissions by either party.

The entire history of the unfortunate affair supports the good faith of Colombia and calls for a settlement in the spirit proposed. In 1903, our Government having theretofore determined to construct the Panama Canal, sought the right from the Government of Colombia, which then held title to and sovereignty over the territory now embraced in the Canal Zone. To such end on the 22d day of January, 1903, a treaty was signed at Washington known as the Hay-Herran treaty. The treaty was ratified by the United States Senate, but was rejected by Colombia. On the 3d day of November, 1903, the Panama revolution broke out. The U. S. S. Nashville, which had been ordered to Panama in anticipation of the revolution, had arrived. The United States marines resisted the Colombian troops which landed for the purpose of putting down the revolution, and later prevented them from recapturing Panama.

Mr. Roosevelt in his statement concerning the matter filed with the committee, says:

> It is therefore perfectly true that I prevented any attempt by Colombia to land troops on the Isthmus and plunge the Isthmus into a long-drawn-out bloody war.

The revolution was a success, and Panama as a de facto government thus acquired title to and sovereignty over the Panama Canal Zone.

On the 18th day of November, 1903, only 15 days after this peculiar revolution broke out, President Roosevelt caused the United States to enter into a treaty with the unorganized revolutionary Government of Panama, wherein Panama conveyed to the United States title to and sovereignty over the Canal Zone. This, it is argued, canceled our obligations, both legal and moral, to the Government of Colombia.

There is no question of the title we received from Panama, but the part our Government had in the Panama revolution is a matter that may reasonably be the subject of controversy. In the Hay-Herran treaty the United States agreed to pay Colombia $10,000,000 upon the ratification of the treaty and $250,000 annually after four years from date, and to guarantee to her substantially all of the special privileges contained in the pending treaty. All these benefits Colombia lost through the Panama revolution.

The minority of the committee, in the printed statement of their views, charge that Colombia is attempting to blackmail the United States. Was Colombia attempting to blackmail the United States in 1909, when President Roosevelt obtained signatures to the treaties between the United States and Colombia and the United States and Panama and between Panama and Colombia, by the terms of which Colombia recognized the existence of Panama as a sovereign power and received as a consideration $2,500,000 from Panama and substantially the same privileges in the Canal Zone provided in the pending treaty? In the terms of the minority, may I ask why a treaty with Colombia was then desired? What had Colombia then to convey for the $2,500,000 and such special privileges that she has not now?

Mr. Root, by approval of President Roosevelt, in the introductory clause to the treaty of 1909, said:

> The United States of America and the Republic of Colombia, being equally animated by the desire to remove all obstacles to a good understanding between them and to facilitate the settlement of the questions heretofore pending between Colombia and Panama by adjusting at the same time the relations of Colombia to the canal which the United States is now constructing across the Isthmus of Panama, have resolved to conclude a treaty, and to that end have appointed as their plenipotentiaries. * * *

Were there any questions then pending? Were there any moral or legal concessions then due Colombia? If there were no concessions due, then why did President Roosevelt and Mr. Root propose them? If such questions did exist then, have they ever been settled? If such concessions were then due, have they ever been made?

In 1912 and 1913, Mr. KNOX, Secretary of State under President Taft, recognized the claim of Colombia to the extent that there were justiciable questions as to the rights of Colombia in the conditions arising out of the Panama revolution. Mr. KNOX in a communication to the American minister to Colombia, under date of December 6, 1912, said in speaking of Colombian contentions:

However, inasmuch as the latter Government appears to consider itself still the owner of those reversionary rights, and in view of the attitude which this Government takes in the premises, and having in mind the justiciable character of this difference of view, the department would, should the course of the negotiations show that such a course would be necessary to secure a final adjustment of all difficulties, be inclined to look with favor upon the suggestion to arbitrate this question. * * *

President Taft and Mr. KNOX recognized the advisability of entering into some convention with Colombia for the purpose of forever settling the unhappy controversy which originated in the separation of Panama and of definitely settling the relations of Colombia to the Panama Canal. Why should these efforts have been made if the conclusions of the minority are correct? And yet such efforts were continued by President Taft and Mr. KNOX until the Democratic administration went into power, and ever since then the present administration has persisted in such efforts.

There are justiciable questions that should be settled, and I believe it best to settle them in the broad spirit of generosity and compromise. This is the only spirit in which a powerful nation can afford to treat with a weaker.

SIXTY-FIFTH CONGRESS,
FIRST SESSION.

Congressional Record.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SIXTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

MONDAY, April 2, 1917.

The first session of the Sixty-fifth Congress commenced this day at the Capitol, in the city of Washington, in pursuance of the proclamation of the President of the United States of the 21st day of March, 1917.

The VICE PRESIDENT (THOMAS R. MARSHALL, of Indiana) called the Senate to order at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. J. L. Kibler, of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

In the simplicity of our hearts, O God, and in the very depths of humility we come into Thy presence. At the opening of this extraordinary session of Congress we come first to seek Thy guiding hand. Amid the confusion and violence of the world to-day we can not know the things that may shortly come to pass. Lead us, O God, through the darkness until the day dawns and the shadows flee away. Enlighten our minds, control our thoughts, direct our speech, and give us wisdom and grace to defend the truth and to advocate the cause of righteousness.

At this critical time in our country's history we pray Thee lead Thy servants in the plain path, teach them Thy ways, and inspire them with those lofty aims and principles that emanate from Thy throne and which have been the heritage of our people from the beginning. In all their deliberations may they seek the accomplishment of Thy purposes and the enlargement of Thy kingdom in the earth. We ask it all in the name of Christ the Lord. Amen.

THE PROCLAMATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proclamation of the President of the United States convening Congress in extraordinary session.

The Secretary (James M. Baker) read the proclamation, as follows:

Given under my hand and the seal of the United States of America the 21st day of March, in the year of our Lord 1917, and of the independence of the United States the one hundred and forty-first.

NOTIFICATION TO THE HOUSE.

Mr. MARTIN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 19), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled and that the Senate is ready to proceed to business.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. MARTIN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 20), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of two Senators be appointed to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House is assembled and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Mr. MARTIN and Mr. GALLINGER the committee on the part of the Senate.

HOUR OF DAILY MEETING.

Mr. MARTIN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 21), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the hour of daily meeting of the Senate be 12 o'clock meridian until otherwise ordered.

RECESS.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I am advised there is a strong probability that the House of Representatives will perfect its organization by 3 o'clock, and it will, I understand, be the pleasure of the President to address both branches of Congress as soon as the organization of the House is completed. I therefore move that the Senate take a recess until 3 o'clock p. m.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until 3 o'clock p. m., when it reassembled.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I am informed that it is the wish of the President to address the two Houses of Congress this afternoon just as soon as the other House completes its organization. I have just returned from the House, and it is there thought that they may possibly be organized by 5 o'clock, but certainly by 5.30. Under these circumstances I feel that it would be wise for the Senate to recess further until 5 o'clock. I move that the Senate take a recess until 5 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until 5 o'clock p. m., when it reassembled.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess until a quarter of 8. I will state in explanation it has been arranged that the President will address the two Houses of Congress at 8 o'clock. The organization of the other House was not perfected so as to permit an earlier hour. So I move that the Senate take a recess until a quarter before 8 o'clock this evening.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 1 minute p. m.) the Senate took a recess until 7 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m., when it reassembled.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, in the absence of the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] I have been requested to say that it has been found necessary to postpone the time of the President's address until 8.30; and I was also requested to move, which I do now, that the Senate take a recess until 8.15 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 7 o'clock and 46 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until 8 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m., when it reassembled.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

Mr. South, the Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives, appeared and delivered the following message:

Mr. President, I am directed by the House of Representatives to inform the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives has assembled; that CHAMP CLARK, a Representative from the State of Missouri, has been elected Speaker; that South Trimble, a citizen of the State of Kentucky, has been elected Clerk; and that the House is ready for business.

Also, that a committee of three was appointed by the Speaker on the part of the House of Representatives to join the committee on the part of the Senate to wait on the President of the United States and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled and that Congress is ready to receive any communication which he may be pleased to make, and that Mr. KITCHIN, Mr. FITZGERALD, and Mr. MANN were appointed as the committee on the part of the House.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. MARTIN, on behalf of the committee on the part of the Senate appointed to wait on the President of the United States, appeared and said:

Mr. President, the committee appointed to act in conjunction with a like committee on the part of the House of Representatives to wait upon the President of the United States and to inform him of the organization of the two Houses of Congress have performed the duty assigned them, and beg leave to report that the President has expressed his purpose to communicate to the two Houses in joint session in the Hall of the House of Representatives forthwith.

JOINT MEETING OF THE TWO HOUSES.

A message from the House of Representative, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution providing that the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Monday, the 2d day of April, 1917, at 8 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m., for the purpose of receiving such communications as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make them, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

House concurrent resolution 2.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Monday, the 2d day of April, 1917, at 8 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m., for the purpose of receiving such communications as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make them.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate concur in the resolution of the House of Representatives.

The resolution was concurred in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Sergeant at Arms will carry out the instructions of the Senate, and the Senate will proceed to the Hall of the House of Representatives.

Thereupon the Senate, preceded by its Sergeant at Arms, and headed by the Vice President and the Secretary, proceeded to the Hall of the House of Representatives.

At 9 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m. the Senate returned to its Chamber, and the Vice President resumed the chair.

ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (S. DOC. NO. 5.)

The address of the President of the United States this day delivered at a joint session of the two Houses of Congress is as follows:

GENTLEMEN OF THE CONGRESS: I have called the Congress into extraordinary session because there are serious, very serious, choices of policy to be made, and made immediately, which it was neither right nor constitutionally permissible that I should assume the responsibility of making.

On the third of February last I officially laid before you the extraordinary announcement of the Imperial German Government that on and after the first day of February it was its purpose to put aside all restraints of law or of humanity and use its submarines to sink every vessel that sought to approach either the ports of Great Britain and Ireland or the western coasts of Europe or any of the ports controlled by the enemies of Germany within the Mediterranean. That had seemed to be the object of the German submarine warfare earlier in the war, but since April of last year the Imperial Government had somewhat restrained the commanders of its undersea craft in conformity with its promise then given to us that passenger boats should not be sunk and that due warning would be given to all other vessels which its submarines might seek to destroy, when no resistance was offered or escape attempted, and care taken that their crews were given at least a fair chance to save their lives in their open boats. The precautions taken were meagre and haphazard enough, as was proved in distressing instance after instance in the progress of the cruel and unmanly business, but a certain degree of restraint was observed. The new policy has swept every restriction aside. Vessels of every kind, whatever their flag, their character, their cargo, their destination, their errand, have been ruthlessly sent to the bottom without warning and without thought of help or mercy for those on board, the vessels of friendly neutrals along with those of belligerents. Even hospital ships and ships carrying relief to the sorely bereaved and stricken people of Belgium, though the latter were provided with safe conduct through the proscribed areas by the German Government itself and were distinguished by unmistakable marks of identity, have been sunk with the same reckless lack of compassion or of principle.

I was for a little while unable to believe that such things would in fact be done by any government that had hitherto subscribed to the humane practices of civilized nations. International law had its origin in the attempt to set up some law which would be respected and observed upon the seas, where no nation had right of dominion and where lay the free highways of the world. By painful stage after stage has that law been built up, with meagre enough results, indeed, after all was accomplished that could be accomplished, but always with a clear view, at least, of what the heart and conscience of mankind demanded. This minimum of right the German Government has swept aside under the plea of retaliation and necessity and because it had no weapons which it could use at sea except these which it is impossible to employ as it is employing them without throwing to the winds all scruples of humanity or of respect for the understandings that were supposed to underlie the intercourse of the world. I am not now thinking of the loss of property involved, immense and serious as that is, but only of the wanton and wholesale destruction of the lives of noncombatants, men, women, and children, engaged in pursuits which have always, even in the darkest periods of modern history, been deemed innocent and legitimate. Property can be paid for; the lives of peaceful and innocent people cannot be. The present German submarine warfare against commerce is a warfare against mankind.

It is a war against all nations. American ships have been sunk, American lives taken, in ways which it has stirred us very deeply to learn of, but the ships and people of other neutral and friendly nations have been sunk and overwhelmed in the waters in the same way. There has been no discrimination. The challenge is to all mankind. Each nation must decide for itself how it will meet it. The choice we make for ourselves must be made with a moderation of counsel and a temperateness of judgment befitting our character and our motives as a nation. We must put excited feeling away. Our motive will not be revenge or the victorious assertion of the physical might of the nation, but only the vindication of right, of human right, of which we are only a single champion.

When I addressed the Congress on the twenty-sixth of February last I thought that it would suffice to assert our neutral rights with arms, our right to use the seas against unlawful interference, our right to keep our people safe against unlawful violence. But armed neutrality, it now appears, is impracticable. Because submarines are in effect outlaws when used as the German submarines have been used against merchant shipping, it is impossible to defend ships against their attacks as the law of nations has assumed that merchantmen would defend themselves against privateers or cruisers, visible craft giving chase upon the open sea. It is common prudence in such circumstances, grim necessity indeed, to endeavour to destroy them before they have shown their own intention. They must be dealt with upon sight, if dealt with at all. The German Government denies the right of neutrals to use arms at all within the areas of the sea which it has proscribed, even in the defense of rights which no modern publicist has ever before questioned their right to defend. The intimation is conveyed that the armed guards which we have placed on our merchant ships will be treated as beyond the pale of law and subject to be dealt with as pirates would be. Armed neutrality is ineffectual enough at best; in such circumstances and in the face of such pretensions it is worse than ineffectual: it is likely only to produce what it was meant to prevent; it is practically certain to draw us into the war without either the rights or the effectiveness of belligerents. There is one choice we cannot make, we are incapable of making: we will not choose the path of submission and suffer the most sacred rights of our nation and our people to be ignored or violated. The wrongs against which we now array ourselves are no common wrongs; they cut to the very roots of human life.

With a profound sense of the solemn and even tragical character of the step I am taking and of the grave responsibilities which it involves, but in unhesitating obedience to what I deem my constitutional duty, I advise that the Congress declare the recent course of the Imperial German Government to be in fact nothing less than war against the government and people of the United States; that it formally accept the status of belligerent which has thus been thrust upon it; and that it take immediate steps not only to put the country in a more thorough state of defense but also to exert all its power and employ all its resources to bring the Government of the German Empire to terms and end the war.

What this will involve is clear. It will involve the utmost practicable cooperation in counsel and action with the governments now at war with Germany, and, as incident to that, the extension to those governments of the most liberal financial credits, in order that our resources may so far as possible be added to theirs. It will involve the organization and mobilization of all the material resources of the country to supply the materials of war and serve the incidental needs of the nation in the most abundant and yet the most economical and efficient way possible. It will involve the immediate full equipment of the navy in all respects but particularly in supplying it with the best means of dealing with the enemy's submarines. It will involve the immediate addition to the armed forces of the United States already provided for by law in case of war at least five hundred thousand men, who should, in my opinion, be chosen upon the principle of universal liability to service, and also the authorization of subsequent additional increments of equal force so soon as they may be needed and can be handled in training. It will involve also, of course, the granting of adequate credits to the Government, sustained, I hope, so far as they can equitably be sustained by the present generation, by well conceived taxation.

I say sustained so far as may be equitable by taxation because it seems to me that it would be most unwise to base the credits which will now be necessary entirely on money borrowed. It is our duty, I most respectfully urge, to protect our people so far as we may against the very serious hardships and evils which would be likely to arise out of the inflation which would be produced by vast loans.

In carrying out the measures by which these things are to be accomplished we should keep constantly in mind the wisdom of interfering as little as possible in our own preparation and in the equipment of our own military forces with the duty,—for it will be a very practical duty,—of supplying the nations already at war with Germany with the materials which they can obtain only from us or by our assistance. They are in the field and we should help them in every way to be effective there.

I shall take the liberty of suggesting, through the several executive departments of the Government, for the consideration of your committees, measures for the accomplishment of the several objects I have mentioned. I hope that it will be your pleasure to deal with them as having been framed after very careful thought by the branch of the Government upon which the responsibility of conducting the war and safeguarding the nation will most directly fall.

While we do these things, these deeply momentous things, let us be very clear, and make very clear to all the world what our motives and our objects are. My own thought has not been driven from its habitual and normal course by the unhappy events of the last two months, and I do not believe that the thought of the nation has been altered or clouded by them. I have exactly the same things in mind now that I had in mind when I addressed the Senate on the twenty-second of January last; the same that I had in mind when I addressed the Congress on the third of February and on the twenty-sixth of February. Our object now, as then, is to vindicate the principles of peace and justice in the life of the world as against selfish and autocratic power and to set up amongst the really free and self-governed peoples of the world such a concert of purpose and of action as will henceforth ensure the observance of those principles. Neutrality is no longer feasible or desirable where the peace of the world is involved and the freedom of its peoples, and the menace to that peace and freedom lies in the existence of autocratic governments backed by organized force which is controlled wholly by their will, not by the will of their people. We have seen the last of neutrality in such circumstances. We are at the beginning of an age in which it will be insisted that the same standards of conduct and of responsibility for wrong done shall be observed among nations and their governments that are observed among the individual citizens of civilized states.

We have no quarrel with the German people. We have no feeling towards them but one of sympathy and friendship. It was not upon their impulse that their government acted in entering this war. It was not with their previous knowledge or approval. It was a war determined upon as wars used to be determined upon in the old, unhappy days when peoples were nowhere consulted by their rulers and wars were provoked and waged in the interest of dynasties or of little groups of ambitious men who were accustomed to use their fellow men as pawns and tools. Self-governed nations do not fill their neighbour states with spies or set the course of intrigue to bring about some critical posture of affairs which will give them an opportunity to strike and make conquest. Such designs can be successfully worked out only under cover and where no one has the right to ask questions. Cunningly contrived plans of deception or aggression, carried, it may be, from generation to generation, can be worked out and kept from the light only within the privacy of courts or behind the carefully guarded confidences of a narrow and privileged class. They are happily impossible where public opinion commands and insists upon full information concerning all the nation's affairs.

A steadfast concert for peace can never be maintained except by a partnership of democratic nations. No autocratic government could be trusted to keep faith within it or observe its covenants. It must be a league of honour, a partnership of opinion. Intrigue would eat its vitals away; the plottings of inner circles who could plan what they would and render account to no one would be a corruption seated at its very heart. Only free peoples can hold their purpose and their honour steady to a common end and prefer the interests of mankind to any narrow interest of their own.

Does not every American feel that assurance has been added to our hope for the future peace of the world by the wonderful and heartening things that have been happening within the last few weeks in Russia? Russia was known by those who knew it best to have been always in fact democratic at heart, in all the vital habits of her thought, in all the intimate relationships of her people that spoke their natural instinct, their habitual attitude towards life. The autocracy that crowned the summit of her political structure, long as it had stood and terrible as was the reality of its power, was not in fact Russian in origin, character, or purpose; and now it has been shaken off and the great, generous Russian people have been added in all their naive majesty and might to the forces that are fighting for freedom in the world, for justice, and for peace. Here is a fit partner for a League of Honour.

One of the things that has served to convince us that the Prussian autocracy was not and could never be our friend is that from the very outset of the present war it has filled our unsuspecting communities and even our offices of government with spies and set criminal intrigues everywhere afoot against our national unity of counsel, our peace within and without, our industries and our commerce. Indeed it is now evident that its spies were here even before the war began; and it is unhappily not a matter of conjecture but a fact proved in our courts of justice that the intrigues which have more than once come perilously near to disturbing the peace and dislocating the industries of the country have been carried on at the instigation, with the support, and even under the personal direction of official agents of the Imperial Government accredited to the Government of the United States. Even in checking these things and trying to extirpate them we have sought to put the most generous interpretation possible upon them because we knew that their source lay, not in any hostile feeling or purpose of the German people towards us (who were, no doubt as ignorant of them as we ourselves were), but only in the selfish designs of a Government that did what it pleased and told its people nothing. But they have played their part in serving to convince us at last that that Government entertains no real friendship for us and means to act against our peace and security at its convenience. That it means to stir up enemies against us at our very doors the intercepted note to the German Minister at Mexico City is eloquent evidence.

We are accepting this challenge of hostile purpose because we know that in such a government, following such methods, we can never have a friend; and that in the presence of its organized power, always lying in wait to accomplish we know not what purpose, there can be no assured security for the democratic governments of the world. We are now about to accept gauge of battle with this natural foe to liberty and shall, if necessary, spend the whole force of the nation to check and nullify its pretensions and its power. We are glad, now that we see the facts with no veil of false pretence about them, to fight thus for the ultimate peace of the world and for the liberation of its peoples, the German peoples included: for the rights of nations great and small and the privilege of men everywhere to choose their way of life and of obedience. The world must be made safe for democracy. Its peace must be planted upon the tested foundations of political liberty. We have no selfish ends to serve. We desire no conquest, no dominion. We seek no indemnities for ourselves, no material compensation for the sacrifices we shall freely make. We are but one of the champions of the rights of mankind. We shall be satisfied when those rights have been made as secure as the faith and the freedom of nations can make them.

Just because we fight without rancour and without selfish object, seeking nothing for ourselves but what we shall wish to share with all free peoples, we shall, I feel confident, conduct our operations as belligerents without passion and ourselves observe with proud punctilio the principles of right and of fair play we profess to be fighting for.

I have said nothing of the governments allied with the Imperial Government of Germany because they have not made war upon us or challenged us to defend our right and our honour. The Austro-Hungarian Government has, indeed, avowed its unqualified endorsement and acceptance of the reckless and lawless submarine warfare adopted now without disguise by the Imperial German Government, and it has therefore not been possible for this Government to receive Count Tarnowski, the Ambassador recently accredited to this Government by the Imperial and Royal Government of Austria-Hungary; but that Government has not actually engaged in warfare against citizens of the United Sates on the seas, and I take the liberty, for the present at least, of postponing a discussion of our relations with the authorities at Vienna. We enter this war only where we are clearly forced into it because there are no other means of defending our rights.

It will be all the easier for us to conduct ourselves as belligerents in a high spirit of right and fairness because we act without animus, not in enmity towards a people or with the desire to bring any injury or disadvantage upon them, but only in armed opposition to an irresponsible government which has thrown aside all considerations of humanity and of right and is running amuck. We are, let me say again, the sincere friends of the German people, and shall desire nothing so much as the early re-establishment of intimate relations of mutual advantage between us,—however hard it may be for them, for the time being, to believe that this is spoken from our hearts. We have borne with their present government through all these bitter months because of that friendship,—exercising a patience and forbearance which would otherwise have been impossible. We shall, happily, still have an opportunity to prove that friendship in our daily attitude and actions towards the millions of men and women of German birth and native sympathy who live amongst us and share our life, and we shall be proud to prove it towards all who are in fact loyal to their neighbours and to the Government in the hour of test. They are, most of them, as true and loyal Americans as if they had never known any other fealty or allegiance. They will be prompt to stand with us in rebuking and restraining the few who may be of a different mind and purpose. If there should be disloyalty, it will be dealt with with a firm hand of stern repression; but, if it lifts its head at all, it will lift it only here and there and without countenance except from a lawless and malignant few.

It is a distressing and oppressive duty, Gentlemen of the Congress, which I have performed in thus addressing you. There are, it may be, many months of fiery trial and sacrifice ahead of us. It is a fearful thing to lead this great peaceful people into war, into the most terrible and disastrous of all wars, civilization itself seeming to be in the balance. But the right is more precious than peace, and we shall fight for the things which we have always carried nearest our hearts,—for democracy, for the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own governments, for the rights and liberties of small nations, for a universal dominion of right by such a concert of free peoples as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free. To such a task we can dedicate our lives and our fortunes, everything that we are and everything that we have, with the pride of those who know that the day has come when America is privileged to spend her blood and her might for the principles that gave her birth and happiness and the peace which she has treasured. God helping her, she can do no other.

WAR WITH GERMANY.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I send to the desk a joint resolution, which I ask may be read at length and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 1) declaring that a state of war exists between the Imperial German Government and the Government and people of the United States, and making provision to prosecute the same, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas the recent acts of the Imperial German Government are acts of war against the Government and the people of the United States:

Resolved, etc., That the state of war between the United States and the Imperial German Government which has thus been thrust upon the United States is hereby formally declared; and

That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to take immediate steps not only to put the country in a thorough state of defense, but also to exert all of its power and employ all of its resources to carry on war against the Imperial German Government and to bring the conflict to a successful termination.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 9 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, April 3 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 2, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

This being the day fixed in the proclamation of the President for the assembling of the first session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, the Clerk of the last House, Mr. South Trimble, called the House to order.

The Chaplain of the House of Representatives of the Sixty-fourth Congress, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

God of the ages, Our fathers' God and our God, whose holy influence has shaped and guided the destiny of our Republic from its inception, we wait upon that influence to guide us in the present crisis which has been thrust upon us. Diplomacy has failed; moral suasion has failed; every appeal to reason and justice has been swept aside. We abhor war and love peace. But if war has been or shall be forced upon us, we pray that the heart of every American citizen shall throb with patriotic zeal; that a united people may rally around our President to hold up his hands in every measure that shall be deemed necessary to protect American lives and safeguard our inherent rights. Let Thy blessing, we beseech Thee, attend the Congress now convened in extraordinary session under extraordinary conditions which call for extraordinary thought, wise counsels, calm and deliberate legislation; that its resolves and all its enactments may spring spontaneously from loyal and patriotic hearts; that our defenders on land and sea may be amply supplied with the things which make for strength and efficiency.

And, O God, our Heavenly Father, let Thy strong right arm uphold, sustain, and guide us in a just and righteous cause; for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory, forever. Amen.

PROCLAMATION OF THE PRESIDENT.

The CLERK. The Clerk will cause to be read the proclamation of the President assembling the Sixty-fifth Congress in extraordinary session.

The proclamation of the President was read as follows:

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA—A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas public interests require that the Congress of the United States should be convened in extra session at 12 o'clock noon on the 2d day of April, 1917, to receive a communication concerning grave matters of national policy which should be taken immediately under consideration;

Now, therefore I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America, do hereby proclaim and declare that an extraordinary occasion requires the Congress of the United States to convene in extra session at the Capitol in the city of Washington on the 2d day of April, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon, of which all persons who shall at that time be entitled to act as Members thereof are hereby required to take notice.

Given under my hand and the seal of the United States of America the 21st day of March, in the year of our Lord 1917 and of the independence of the United States the one hundred and forty-first.

[SEAL.] WOODROW WILSON.

By the President:

ROBERT LANSING,
Secretary of State.

The CLERK. Four hundred and twenty-eight Members have answered "present," a quorum.

The Clerk has prepared a statement of the changes in the membership caused by death since the last regular election. Without objection, it will be printed in the RECORD:

The statement is as follows:

Eighth Georgia.....	Samuel J. Tribble...	Dec. 8, 1916	Charles H. Brand.
Fifteenth New York...	Michael F. Conry...	Mar. 2, 1917

First New Hampshire..	Cyrus A. Sulloway..	Mar. 11, 1917

ELECTION OF SPEAKER.

The CLERK. The next business in order is the election of a Speaker. Nominations for Speaker are in order.

Mr. SCHALL. We are met to-day efficiently and harmoniously to organize the House and quickly to put it into condition to transact the public business. The issue of the organization of this House is the issue of the Nation. It is not the tariff; it is not whether any one party, any one man, or any one group of men shall fail or succeed. The question is whether the Nation, involved in an international crisis, shall show to the world a solid front. [Applause.] Full cooperation between the President and Congress should be a national benefit, impossible with one branch Republican and one branch Democratic. [Applause.] A State divided against itself would stand in time of peace, but to-day such a condition might hold a serious menace. To-day our vision should project beyond party cleavage. The responsibility weighing down our President should inspire the utmost cooperation, even to the extent of foregoing party advantage, that to-day's action may square with the public good. [Applause.]

The extraordinary peril to-day renders partisanship dangerous, for it would be interpreted as showing a divided spirit. To-day there should be just one party, and that is the American party. [Applause.] We can settle our domestic differences later. Standing at the crossway of party and Nation, as an independent Progressive Republican I have no hesitancy as to which way is right. The responsibility of my vote has weighed heavily upon my soul. I have reviewed and rereviewed the situation from every possible angle, and I have again and again been forced to the same conclusion. I have asked God to guide me, that in my vote I might not be false to any man, much less betray a trust confided in me.

I am not unmindful of the sterling, deserving, patriotic character of the able, hard-working, faithful Republican candidate, and were our country not facing an international crisis, with a Democratic President and a Democratic Senate, I should with full party pride cast my vote for the Republican candidate. My father was a Republican and voted for and fought under Abraham Lincoln. I have always been a Republican and still am a Lincoln Republican, and I believe that the spirit of that greatest American is here with us to-day, guiding the destiny of our Nation, upholding the hands of our President in this hour of trial.

I realize that my action to-day will be used to attempt my political death, for out of 43,000 votes in my district over 32,000 are Republican. But I am ready at any time to give of myself whatever my country can use. With my sightless eyes I would be of little service on the field of battle, but in the position I hold I can to-day, with the light that God gives me, vote right and let the consequences to me be what they may. [Applause.] The responsibility of Congress, I believe, should be with the President. Should the Republican Party succeed in organizing the House, evenly divided as it is, with a Democratic Senate and a Democratic President, it could accrue no possible advantage, and would only furnish an excuse for Democratic failures. The party that have controlled our Nation during the development of the present crisis should reap the harvest of the seeds they have sown.

From all over the country, by wire, by letter, by petition, by newspaper, by voice, have come the word, whatever it may mean, "Stand by the President." [Applause.] The legislature of my State, with only one dissenting vote, passed resolutions to that effect. Labor, professional, business, civic, farmers, and church organizations and individuals all urge the upholding of the President. Leading Republicans from all over the country, among them no less than the illustrious ex-Presidents Roosevelt and Taft, and Elihu Root and Charles E. Hughes, pledge their word to stand by the President in this international crisis. Newspapers from coast to coast are editorially calling upon the men intrusted with the Nation's heritage to stand by the President. I know of no better way, at the outset of this Congress, to assist the President in standing erect under his heavy burden than to help him retain the organization of the House, and I shall therefore cast my vote for that progressive Democrat, CHAMP CLARK [applause], one of the most able and one of the squarest men who has ever graced the Speaker's chair. [Applause.] In so doing it is my patriotic hope that not to-morrow nor the next day, but to-day, after the first roll call, the trained lightning may flash the message of our unity, a warning to all the world that, despite internal differences, when external danger threatens, from North to South, from East to West, Americans stand for America. [Applause.]

The CLERK. Did the gentleman from Minnesota intend to place Mr. CLARK of Missouri in nomination for Speaker?

Mr. SCHALL. It was not my intention. I merely wished to state the reasons and motive for my vote; but I deem it an unusual honor. I gladly place him in nomination for Speaker.

The CLERK. CHAMP CLARK, of Missouri, has been placed in nomination for Speaker of the House.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Clerk, the Republican party has never failed in its duty during its entire history. [Applause.] I appear here to-day by reason of the position I hold, granted to me by the Republican Party, and, in accordance with the instructions of the meeting of Republican members elect held on Saturday last, I nominate as candidate for Speaker the Hon. JAMES R. MANN, of Illinois. [Applause.]

The Republican Party needs to make no apology for its action in this House to-day. We, ourselves, shall act as we believe to be right, as we always have, and leave the question with the people as to whether we act rightfully or wrongfully. [Applause.]

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Clerk, I rise to second the nomination of JAMES R. MANN for Speaker. [Applause.] Mr. Clerk, I had no intention of speaking upon the matter of the nominations. I merely expected to vote for the Republican nominee, but as a Republican I can not permit the statement just made by the gentleman from Minnesota and the inferences to be drawn therefrom to go unchallenged. [Applause.]

The position that the gentleman takes is that in this crisis patriotism demands that the organization of this House be turned over to the Democrats. Mr. Clerk, as a Republican I can not admit that Republicans are less patriotic than are Democrats [applause], and if the gentlemen upon the Democratic side of the aisle to-day would practice the principles that they now applaud and avoid partisanship patriotism demands that they submit to a Republican organization of this House, and I wish to state why this should be done. There ought not to be any partisanship in the consideration of the great matters that will come before this special session of Congress. There will be no partisanship on the Republican side of the House, irrespective of what the Democrats may do. But, gentlemen, what we need in this hour is a united country. [Applause.] What we need in this hour is the wisdom, the advice, and the assistance of every American, regardless of what his politics may be. [Applause.] Is there one of you upon that side of the aisle that will not admit privately that if Republicans were consulted as well as Democrats upon these great questions, that if the country could understand that while we have a Democratic President and a Democratic Senate there was a Republican House acting unitedly upon these great questions, we would have a united country behind us much more effectively than with a partisan Democratic administration? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Clerk, this is no time for any man to criticize the President of the United States; but I do beg leave to say that it would be better for the country to-day if the President was compelled under the organization of this House to consult Republicans as well as Democrats upon legislation in this crisis. [Applause.] He would be thus compelled if the Republicans organized the House, while to-day, unfortunately, the situation is that no Republican in the Senate or in the House has been, so far as I can ascertain, consulted upon the greatest questions that this country has been confronted with for more than half a century; questions as to which there ought not to be the slightest partisanship.

In conclusion, you gentlemen upon that side of the House will probably organize to-day. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And we upon this side will have performed our duty, our patriotic duty, because we believe we can be trusted as well as you upon nonpartisan questions. But if you organize, notwithstanding any partisanship that may be displayed by you, I say now that in the days to come there will be no partisanship on the Republican side upon these matters. [Applause.]

The CLERK. Are there any further nominations? If not, the Clerk will call the roll. The Chair will appoint as tellers to count the vote the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. TAGUE, the gentleman from California, Mr. LEA, the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. MILLER, and the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. BROWNING, who will please take their places at the desk. The Clerk will call the roll and Members will designate whom they desire to elect as Speaker.

The tellers having taken their places, the House proceeded to vote viva voce for Speaker. The following is the vote in detail:

FOR MR. FREDERICK H. GILLETT—2.

Dallinger	Gray, N. J.

FOR MR. IRVINE L. LENROOT—2.

Fuller, Mass.	Gardner

ANSWERED "PRESENT"—2.

Haskell	James

At the conclusion of the roll,

The CLERK said: The result of the ballot as agreed to by the tellers is as follows: Mr. CHAMP CLARK, of Missouri, received 217 votes; Mr. JAMES R. MANN, of Illinois, received 205 votes; Mr. FREDERICK H. GILLETT, of Massachusetts, received 2 votes; Mr. IRVINE L. LENROOT, of Wisconsin, received 2 votes; answering "present" 2. Total number of votes cast, 428. Mr. CLARK having received 217 votes, a majority of all the votes cast, and a quorum being present and voting, is duly elected Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Sixty-fifth Congress. [Applause.] The Clerk appoints as a committee to notify Mr. CLARK of his election and to escort him to the chair Mr. MANN of Illinois, Mr. RIORDAN of New York, and Mr. SHOUSE of Kansas.

The committee appointed to conduct the Speaker elect to the chair having returned with him,

Mr. MANN said: Members of the House of Representatives, I present to you your chosen Speaker, the genial, able, impartial, patriotic statesman of Missouri and the Nation, Hon. CHAMP CLARK. [Applause.]

ADDRESS OF THE SPEAKER.

The SPEAKER elect, on taking the chair, said:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I am profoundly grateful to the House for my fourth election to the Speakership. Also to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, my close personal friend, Brother MANN, for the cordial, generous, and splendid manner in which he introduced me. [Applause.]

The delicate situation in which we find ourselves justifies a few words more. I fully appreciate the fact that it will be exceedingly difficult to discharge the duties of the Speakership in this House. It will be almost impossible to do so without the hearty cooperation of the Members without regard to party affiliations. I will use my utmost endeavor to be absolutely fair, and I invoke the aid of all the Members in doing so.

It is absolutely unnecessary and superfluous to lecture the membership on patriotism. We are all patriots, as are the people who elected us. We are all Americans, whether natives or foreign born, as our constituents. On many questions we are "distinct as the billows, yet we are one as the sea," when the honor and safety of the Republic are involved. [Applause.] Politics finds no place in this House when the general welfare and the common defense of the Nation are at stake. Let all the ends we aim at be our country's, and in the accomplishment of these ends may the God of our fathers be with us and guide us in the way which will redound to the honor and perpetuity of the greatest Republic that ever existed in all the flood of time. [Applause.]

I am now ready to take the oath of office and will ask that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT] administer it.

The oath of office was administered by Mr. TALBOTT.

SWEARING IN OF MEMBERS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now call the Members by States, and they will assemble in front of the Speaker's desk and take the oath of office.

The Members presented themselves as their States were called and took the oath of office provided by law.

Mr. GRIEST and Mr. BUTLER affirmed.

ELECTION OF CLERK AND OTHER OFFICERS.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I send to the desk the following resolution, which I ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 1.

Resolved, That Hon. South Trimble, of the State of Kentucky, be, and he is hereby, chosen Clerk of the House of Representatives;

That Robert B. Gordon, of the State of Ohio, be, and he is hereby, chosen Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives;

That Joseph J. Sinnott, of the State of Virginia, be, and he is hereby, chosen Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives;

That William M. Dunbar, of the State of Georgia, be, and he is hereby, chosen Postmaster of the House of Representatives; and

That Henry N. Couden, of the State of Michigan, be, and he is hereby, chosen Chaplain of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Are there any other nominations?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, for the resolution just reported, I offer the following and ask the Clerk to report the same.

The Clerk read as follows:

By Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts: I move to amend the resolution by striking out—

"That South Trimble, of the State of Kentucky, be, and he is hereby, chosen Clerk of the House of Representatives"—

And inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"That William Tyler Page, of the State of Maryland, be, and he is hereby, chosen Clerk of the House of Representatives;"

And by striking out—

"That Robert B. Gordon, of the State of Ohio, be, and he is hereby, chosen Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives"—

And inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"That Joseph G. Rogers, of the State of Pennsylvania, be, and he is hereby, chosen Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives;"

And by striking out—

"That Joseph J. Sinnott, of the State of Virginia, be, and he is hereby, chosen Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives"—

And inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"That Bert W. Kennedy, of the State of Michigan, be, and he is hereby, chosen Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives;"

And by striking out—

"That William M. Dunbar, of the State of Georgia, be, and he is hereby, chosen Postmaster of the House of Representatives"—

And inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"That Lawrence Lyons, of the State of Indiana, be, and he is hereby, chosen Postmaster of the House of Representatives."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, on that amendment I demand a division of the question, so as to cover each of the officers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands a division of the question, and the vote will be taken first upon that part of the amendment which substitutes the name of Tyler Page for that of South Trimble as Clerk of the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask if it would not be possible to have an agreement whereby Members might vote for the nominees of the respective parties?

Mr. MANN. I am quite willing to have that done.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. As it is, the vote will be either yea or nay upon the amendment, whereas, if we can have an arrangement by which we can simply vote for the individual, giving the respective names, that will settle the matter in one roll call.

Mr. MANN. That is satisfactory.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that in taking the vote on the Clerk of the House——

Mr. MANN. Make it on all of them.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. On all of them, if we have a separate vote on each—that we shall vote the names of those for whom we desire to vote for the respective officers.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman asking for a vote upon all five of these officers at once?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No.

The SPEAKER. Then, the understanding is that upon the vote on the Clerkship the Member in casting his vote shall vote for either Mr. Page or Mr. Trimble?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman from Illinois could agree, and if we could do it by unanimous consent, one roll call would settle the entire matter.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no. The reason for offering the amendment in the form in which it is is for the purpose of having a separate vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, what was done with the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] that in voting upon these different officers, where there is a contest, we shall vote for the name of our respective candidates?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the vote shall be for either South Trimble or Tyler Page, by name.

Mr. MANN. I want it to apply to all the offices except that of Chaplain.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is my request, that it shall apply to all except the Chaplain.

The SPEAKER. The request of the gentleman from Tennessee is for unanimous consent to vote for the names of the men who are candidates instead of going through the motion of voting for the substitute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will call the roll on the Clerkship and the vote will be for South Trimble or William Tyler Page.

ELECTION OF CLERK.

The question was taken; and there were—voting for South Trimble 217, for William Tyler Page 213, as follows:

FOR MR. TRIMBLE—217.

So Mr. Dunbar was elected Postmaster of the House.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make the statement that Mr. LEE of Georgia, and Mr. MEEKER, of Missouri have been present and voting, and both are sick and both have left the Hall, and I ask unanimous consent that a pair may be announced for them for the remainder of the day.

The SPEAKER. There will not be any trouble about that. The Clerk will announce the pairs.

The Clerk announced the following pair:

For the remainder of the day:

Mr. LEE of Georgia with Mr. MEEKER.

The SPEAKER. On this vote Mr. Dunbar has 217 votes, Mr. Lyons 206, and Mr. Dunbar is elected Postmaster. [Applause.]

ELECTION OF CHAPLAIN.

Mr. TALBOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., Chaplain of the House in the last Congress, be elected by acclamation Chaplain of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland moves that the Chaplain of the last House, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., be elected Chaplain by acclamation.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The vote recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] as a substitute for the main resolution.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, while the form in which the matter was presented to the House was that of a resolution to which there was an amendment offered—that is what the Speaker has reference to, is it not?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Still, by unanimous consent, the House voted directly upon the names, and the Speaker announced in each case that the person receiving the majority was elected. I would be glad to have some gentleman on the other side ask unanimous consent that that be considered as disposed of and that these gentlemen be declared elected.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, it was contemplated in the request which I made—whether or not it was expressed fully enough to cover the situation I do not now recall—but in order that there may be no question about it I ask unanimous consent that these several gentlemen——

Mr. MANN. That the action taken be considered as the final election in each case.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That they be considered as elected in each case.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the action taken in voting on these gentlemen separately be taken as final, and that they be elected. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SWEARING IN OF OFFICERS OF THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER. If the gentlemen who have been elected will present themselves, the Chair will administer the oath of office to them.

Messrs. Trimble, Gordon, Sinnott, Dunbar, and Couden appeared at the bar of the House and the Speaker administered to them the oath of office.

THE RULES.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina offers a resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 3.

Resolved, That the rules of the House of Representatives of the Sixty-fourth Congress be, and they are hereby, adopted as the rules of the House of Representatives of the Sixty-fifth Congress: Provided, That the Committee on Ways and Means shall consist of 23 members, and the Committee on Rules of 12 members: Provided further, That any motion or resolution to elect the members or any portion of the members of the standing committees of the House and the joint standing committees shall not be divisible.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not stand on the floor and keep still.

Mr. POU. If the gentleman desires time I will be glad to yield to him.

Mr. MANN. I am not asking any favors of the gentleman at this time. He must either do something or yield the floor.

Mr. POU. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question. I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. MANN. The Speaker was putting the question.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from North Carolina yield for a question?

Mr. POU. I will.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, this resolution contains three separate provisions, the most important of which provides for adopting the rules of the Sixty-fourth Congress as the rules of the Sixty-fifth Congress. I had prepared a number of changes in the rules that I would have liked to have considered, but it would be unwise to consider them at this time because of vital matters which demand instant action. As the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] is the ranking member of the Rules Committee, I would like to have an assurance from him that the Rules Committee will promptly take up changes which may be offered and afford the House an opportunity to vote upon them.

Mr. POU. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that if it is my good fortune to be a member of the Committee on Rules I think I am in a position to assure the gentleman that any proposition to change the rules will receive very earnest and early consideration.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. We had an assurance in the Sixty-third Congress and also in the Sixty-fourth Congress to the same effect. Is it not a fact that the suggestions for amendments of the rules have not been considered?

Mr. POU. I will say to the gentleman from North Dakota that all that has passed into history, and I am not in a position and do not attempt to speak of what has occurred in the past. All I can say is that, so far as I am concerned, so far as the majority of the Rules Committee is concerned, the several propositions for a change, and particularly for liberalizing the rules, will receive early and serious consideration. There is no disposition to put it off, and any gentleman who desires to make any changes in the rules will have a very cordial invitation to appear before the committee and make them.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. Will that consideration be such as will bring the suggestions before the House for a vote and not bury the suggestions in the Committee on Rules?

Mr. POU. I can not undertake to say what will be the action of the Rules Committee.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. A fair proposition would be to assure us that action will be taken on the suggestions by the committee. I would not be disposed to vote for the motion presented unless that assurance is given, and I feel that since it is given fairly we may accept it without impeachment.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, in reference to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the gentleman from Pennsylvania will understand that if the Committee on Rules does not see fit to act affirmatively on any suggestion for a change by any Member, if this resolution is adopted, the House will never have an opportunity to vote in the Sixty-fifth Congress on those questions.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question.

The question was taken, and Mr. LENROOT asked for a division.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 216, nays 206, not voting 11, as follows:

So the House decided to consider the resolution.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. LEE of Georgia (for) with Mr. MEEKER (against).

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi (for) with Mr. GOOD (against).

Mr. TALBOTT (for) with Mr. FARR (against).

Mr. EAGAN (for) with Mr. GEORGE W. FAIRCHILD (against).

Mr. FARR. Mr. Speaker, did the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. TALBOTT, vote?

The SPEAKER. He did not.

Mr. FARR. I am paired with him, and I want to withdraw my vote of "nay" and answer "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. MANN. And on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is it in order, pending that order, for the gentleman to yield to me for an inquiry?

Mr. MANN. Of course, it can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I would like to ask unanimous consent to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] asks unanimous consent to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] a question. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I should like to ask the gentleman from Illinois, if he does not object to saying, if it is the purpose of that side to vote against the election of those named as members of the respective committees indicated?

Mr. MANN. It is, so far as I can have any influence.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman knows, of course, that for six years the majority has always permitted the minority to name its members of committees as it saw fit.

Now, is the majority to be opposed by a solid minority in naming——

Mr. MANN. I deny that you are a majority until you settle it by a roll call.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How many roll calls does it take to determine that?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 211, nays 197, answering "present" 2, not voting 24, as follows:

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen of the Sixty-fifth Congress, I present the President of the United States. [Applause.]

ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT (H. DOC. NO. 1.)

The PRESIDENT. Gentlemen of the Congress, I have called the Congress into extraordinary session because there are serious, very serious, choices of policy to be made, and made immediately, which it was neither right nor constitutionally permissible that I should assume the responsibility of making.

On the third of February last I officially laid before you the extraordinary announcement of the Imperial German Government that on and after the first day of February it was its purpose to put aside all restraints of law or of humanity and use its submarines to sink every vessel that sought to approach either the ports of Great Britain and Ireland or the western coasts of Europe or any of the ports controlled by the enemies of Germany within the Mediterranean. That had seemed to be the object of the German submarine warfare earlier in the war, but since April of last year the Imperial Government had somewhat restrained the commanders of its undersea craft in conformity with its promise then given to us that passenger boats should not be sunk and that due warning would be given to all other vessels which its submarines might seek to destroy, when no resistance was offered or escape attempted, and care taken that their crews were given at least a fair chance to save their lives in their open boats. The precautions taken were meagre and haphazard enough, as was proved in distressing instance after instance in the progress of the cruel and unmanly business, but a certain degree of restraint was observed. The new policy has swept every restriction aside. Vessels of every kind, whatever their flag, their character, their cargo, their destination, their errand, have been ruthlessly sent to the bottom without warning and without thought of help or mercy for those on board, the vessels of friendly neutrals along with those of belligerents. Even hospital ships and ships carrying relief to the sorely bereaved and stricken people of Belgium, though the latter were provided with safe conduct through the proscribed areas by the German Government itself and were distinguished by unmistakable marks of identity, have been sunk with the same reckless lack of compassion and of principle.

I was for a little while unable to believe that such things would in fact be done by any government that had hitherto subscribed to the humane practices of civilized nations. International law had its origin in the attempt to set up some law which would be respected and observed upon the seas, where no nation had right of dominion and where lay the free highways of the world. By painful stage after stage has that law been built up, with meagre enough results, indeed, after all was accomplished that could be accomplished, but always with a clear view, at least, of what the heart and conscience of mankind demanded. This minimum of right the German Government has swept aside under the plea of retaliation and necessity and because it had no weapons which it could use at sea except these which it is impossible to employ as it is employing them without throwing to the winds all scruples of humanity or of respect for the understandings that were supposed to underlie the intercourse of the world. I am not now thinking of the loss of property, immense and serious as that is, but only of the wanton and wholesale destruction of the lives of non-combatants, men, women, and children, engaged in pursuits which have always, even in the darkest periods of modern history, been deemed innocent and legitimate. Property can be paid for; the lives of peaceful and innocent people cannot be. The present German submarine warfare against commerce is a warfare against mankind.

It is a warfare against all nations. American ships have been sunk, American lives taken, in ways which it has stirred us very deeply to learn of, but the ships and people of other neutral and friendly nations have been sunk and overwhelmed in the waters in the same way. There has been no discrimination. The challenge is to all mankind. Each nation must decide for itself how it will meet it. The choice we make for ourselves must be made with a moderation of counsel and a temperateness of judgment befitting our character and our motives as a nation. We must put excited feeling away. Our motive will not be revenge or the victorious assertion of the physical might of the nation, but only the vindication of right, of human right, of which we are only a single champion.

When I addressed the Congress on the twenty-sixth of February last I thought that it would suffice to assert our neutral rights with arms, our right to use the seas against unlawful interference, our right to keep our people safe against unlawful violence. But armed neutrality, it now appears, is impracticable. Because submarines are in effect outlaws when used as the German submarines have been used against merchant shipping, it is impossible to defend ships against their attacks as the law of nations has assumed that merchantmen would defend themselves against privateers or cruisers, visible craft giving chase upon the open sea. It is common prudence in such circumstances, grim necessity indeed, to endeavour to destroy them before they have shown their own intention. They must be dealt with upon sight, if dealt with at all. The German Government denies the right of neutrals to use arms at all within the areas of the sea which it has proscribed, even in the defense of rights which no modern publicist has ever before questioned their right to defend. The intimation is conveyed that the armed guards which we have placed on our merchant ships will be treated as beyond the pale of law and subject to be dealt with as pirates would be. Armed neutrality is ineffectual enough at best; in such circumstances and in the face of such pretensions it is worse than ineffectual: it is likely only to produce what it was meant to prevent; it is practically certain to draw us into the war without either the rights or the effectiveness of belligerents. There is one choice we cannot make, we are incapable of making: we will not choose the path of submission [applause] and suffer the most sacred rights of our nation and our people to be ignored or violated. The wrongs against which we now array ourselves are no common wrongs; they cut at the very roots of human life.

With a profound sense of the solemn and even tragical character of the step I am taking and of the grave responsibilities which it involves, but in unhesitating obedience to what I deem my constitutional duty, I advise that the Congress declare the recent course of the Imperial German Government to be in fact nothing less than war against the government and people of the United States [applause]; that it formally accept the status of belligerent which has thus been thrust upon it; and that it take immediate steps not only to put the country in a more thorough state of defense but also to exert all its power and employ all its resources to bring the Government of the German Empire to terms and end the war. [Applause.]

What this will involve is clear. It will involve the utmost practicable cooperation in counsel and action with the governments now at war with Germany [applause], and, as incident to that, the extension to those governments of the most liberal financial credits [applause], in order that our resources may so far as possible be added to theirs. It will involve the organization and mobilization of all the material resources of the country to supply the materials of war and serve the incidental needs of the nation in the most abundant and yet most economical and efficient way possible. It will involve the immediate full equipment of the navy in all respects but particularly in supplying it with the best means of dealing with the enemy's submarines. [Applause.] It will involve the immediate addition to the armed forces of the United States already provided for by law in case of war at least five hundred thousand men [applause], who should, in my judgment, be chosen upon the principle of universal liability to service [applause], and also the authorization of subsequent additional increments of equal force so soon as they may be needed and can be handled in training. It will involve also, of course, the granting of adequate credits to the Government, sustained, I hope, so far as they can equitably be sustained by the present generation, by well conceived taxation.

I say sustained so far as may be equitable by taxation because it seems to me that it would be most unwise to base the credits which will now be necessary entirely on money borrowed. It is our duty, I most respectfully urge, to protect our people so far as we may against the very serious hardships and evils which would be likely to arise out of the inflation which would be produced by vast loans.

In carrying out the measures by which these things are to be accomplished we must keep constantly in mind the wisdom of interfering as little as possible in our own preparation and in the equipment of our own military forces with the duty,—for it will be a very practical duty,—of supplying the nations already at war with Germany with the materials which they can obtain only from us or by our assistance. [Applause.] They are in the field and we should help them in every way to be effective there.

I shall take the liberty of suggesting, through the several executive departments of the Government, for the consideration of your committees, measures for the accomplishment of the several objects I have mentioned. I hope that it will be your pleasure to deal with them as having been framed after very careful thought by the branch of the Government upon which the responsibility of conducting the war and safeguarding the nation will most directly fall.

While we do these things, these deeply momentous things, let us be very clear, and make very clear to all the world what our motives and our objects are. My own thought has not been driven from its habitual and normal course by the unhappy events of the last two months, and I do not believe that the thought of the nation has been altered or clouded by them. I have exactly the same things in mind now that I had in mind when I addressed the Senate on the twenty-second of January last; the same that I had in mind when I addressed the Congress on the third of February and on the twenty-second of February. Our object now, as then, is to vindicate the principles of peace and justice in the life of the world [applause] as against selfish and autocratic power and to set up amongst the really free and self-governed peoples of the world such a concert of purpose and of action as will henceforth ensure the observance of those principles. [Applause.] Neutrality is no longer feasible or desirabe where the peace of the world is involved and the freedom of its peoples, and the menace to that peace and freedom lies in the existence of autocratic governments backed by organized force which is controlled wholly by their will, not by the will of their people. [Applause.] We have seen the last of neutrality in such circumstances. [Applause.] We are at the beginning of an age in which it will be insisted that the same standards of conduct and of responsibility for wrong done shall be observed among nations and their governments that are observed among the individual citizens of civilized states.

We have no quarrel with the German people. [Applause.] We have no feeling towards them but one of sympathy and friendship. It was not upon their impulse that their government acted in entering this war. It was not with their previous knowledge or approval. It was a war determined upon as wars used to be determined upon in the old, unhappy days when peoples were nowhere consulted by their rulers and wars were provoked and waged in the interest of dynasties or of little groups of ambitious men who were accustomed to use their fellow men as pawns and tools. Self-governed nations do not fill their neighbour states with spies or set the course of intrigue [applause] to bring about some critical posture of affairs which will give them an opportunity to strike and make conquest. Such designs can be successfully worked out only under cover and where no man has the right to ask questions. Cunningly contrived plans of deception or aggression, carried, it may be, from generation to generation, can be worked out and kept from the light only within the privacy of courts or behind the carefully guarded confidences of a narrow and privileged class. They are happily impossible where public opinion commands and insists upon full information concerning all the nation's affairs.

A steadfast concert for peace can never be maintained except by a partnership of democratic nations. [Applause.] No autocratic government could be trusted to keep faith within it or observe its covenants. It must be a league of honour, a partnership of opinion. Intrigue would eat its vitals away; the plottings of inner circles who could plan what they would and render account to no one would be a corruption seated at its very heart. Only free peoples can hold their purpose and their honour steady to a common end and prefer the interests of mankind to any narrow interest of their own.

Does not every American feel that assurance has been added to our hope for the future peace of the world by the wonderful and heartening things that have been happening within the last few weeks in Russia? [Applause.] Russia was known by those who knew it best to have been always in fact democratic at heart, in all the vital habits of her thought, in all the intimate relationships of her people that spoke their natural instinct, their habitual attitude towards life. The autocracy that crowned the summit of her political structure, long as it had stood and terrible as was the reality of its power, was not in fact Russian in origin, character, or purpose; and now it has been shaken off and the great, generous Russian people have been added in all their naive majesty and might to the forces that are fighting for freedom in the world, for justice, and for peace. [Applause.] Here is a fit partner for a League of Honour.

One of the things that has served to convince us that the Prussian autocracy was not and could never be our friend is that from the very outset of the present war it has filled our unsuspecting communities and even our offices of government with spies [applause] and set criminal intrigues everywhere afoot against our national unity of counsel, our peace within and without, our industries and our commerce. Indeed it is now evident that its spies were here even before the war began; and it is unhappily not a matter of conjecture but a fact proved in our courts of justice that the intrigues which have more than once come perilously near to disturbing the peace and dislocating the industries of the country have been carried on at the instigation, with the support, and even under the personal direction of official agents of the Imperial Government accredited to the Government of the United States. [Applause.] Even in checking these things and trying to extirpate them we have sought to put the most generous interpretation possible upon them because we knew that their source lay, not in any hostile feeling or purpose of the German people towards us (who were, no doubt as ignorant of them as we ourselves were), but only in the selfish designs of a Government that did what it pleased and told its people nothing. But they have played their part in serving to convince us at last that that Government entertains no real friendship for us and means to act against our peace and security at its convenience. That it means to stir up enemies against us at our very doors the intercepted note to the German Minister at Mexico City is eloquent evidence.

We are accepting this challenge of hostile purpose because we know that in such a government, following such methods, we can never have a friend; and that in the presence of its organized power, always lying in wait to accomplish we know not what purpose, there can be no assured security for the democratic governments of the world. [Applause.] We are now about to accept gauge of battle with this natural foe to liberty and shall, if necessary, spend the whole force of the nation to check and nullify its pretensions and its power. We are glad, now that we see the facts with no veil of false pretence about them, to fight thus for the ultimate peace of the world and for the liberation of its peoples, the German peoples included: for the rights of nations great and small and the privilege of men everywhere to choose their way of life and of obedience. The world must be made safe for democracy. [Applause.] Its peace must be planted upon the tested foundations of political liberty. We have no selfish ends to serve. We desire no conquest, no dominion. We seek no indemnities for ourselves, no material compensation for the sacrifices we shall freely make. We are but one of the champions of the rights of mankind. We shall be satisfied when those rights have been made as secure as the faith and the freedom of nations can make them.

Just because we fight without rancour and without selfish object, seeking nothing for ourselves but what we shall wish to share with all free peoples, we shall, I feel confident, conduct our operations as belligerents without passion and ourselves observe with proud punctilio the principles of right and of fair play we profess to be fighting for.

I have said nothing of the governments allied with the Imperial Government of Germany because they have not made war upon us or challenged us to defend our right and our honour. The Austro-Hungarian Government has, indeed, avowed its unqualified endorsement and acceptance of the reckless and lawless submarine warfare adopted now without disguise by the Imperial German Government, and it has therefore not been possible for this Government to receive Count Tarnowski, the Ambassador recently accredited to this Government by the Imperial and Royal Government of Austria-Hungary; but that Government has not actually engaged in warfare against citizens of the United States on the seas, and I take the liberty, for the present at least, of postponing a discussion of our relations with the authorities at Vienna. We enter this war only where we are clearly forced into it because there are no other means of defending our rights.

It will be all the easier for us to conduct ourselves as belligerents in a high spirit of right and fairness because we act without animus, not in enmity towards a people or with the desire to bring any injury or disadvantage upon them, but only in armed opposition to an irresponsible government which has thrown aside all considerations of humanity and of right and is running amuck. We are, let me say again, the sincere friends of the German people, and shall desire nothing so much as the early re-establishment of intimate relations of mutual advantage between us,—however hard it may be for them, for the time being, to believe that this is spoken from our hearts. We have borne with their present government through all these bitter months because of that friendship,—exercising a patience and forbearance which would otherwise have been impossible. We shall, happily, still have an opportunity to prove that friendship in our daily attitude and actions towards the millions of men and women of German birth and native sympathy who live amongst us and share our life, and we shall be proud to prove it towards all who are in fact loyal to their neighbours and to the Government in the hour of test. [Applause.] They are, most of them, as true and loyal Americans as if they had never known any other fealty or allegiance. They will be prompt to stand with us in rebuking and restraining the few who may be of a different mind and purpose. If there should be disloyalty, it will be dealt with with a firm hand of stern repression [applause]; but, if it lifts its head at all, it will lift it only here and there and without countenance except from a lawless and malignant few.

It is a distressing and oppressive duty, Gentlemen of the Congress, which I have performed in thus addressing you. There are, it may be, many months of fiery trial and sacrifice ahead of us. It is a fearful thing to lead this great peaceful people into war, into the most terrible and disastrous of all wars, civilization itself seeming to be in the balance. But the right is more precious than peace, and we shall fight for the things which we have always carried nearest our hearts,—for democracy, for the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own governments, for the rights and liberties of small nations, for a universal dominion of right by such a concert of free peoples as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free. To such a task we can dedicate our lives and our fortunes, everything that we are and everything that we have, with the pride of those who know that the day has come when America is privileged to spend her blood and her might for the principles that gave her birth and happiness and the peace which she has treasured. God helping her, she can do no other. [Applause.]

At 9 o'clock and 11 minutes p. m. the President retired from the Hall of the House;

Whereupon the Vice President and the Members of the Senate returned to their Chamber.

CONSIDERATION OF APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves to suspend the rules and pass the resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 20.

Resolved, That at any time within 10 days after the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move to suspend the rules and pass the following bills:

H. R. 11, making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes;

H. R. 12, making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and prior years, and for other purposes;

H. R. 13, making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 14, making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. MANN. I demand a second.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has 20 minutes and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] 20 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this resolution is to enable the House within the next 10 days to pass, under suspension of the rules, the four appropriation bills mentioned—the sundry civil bill, the general deficiency bill, the Military Academy bill, and the Army bill—which passed the House in the last session but failed to become laws.

These bills have been introduced in the form in which the last House passed them, and the purpose is to ask the House to pass them under suspension of the rules in the form in which they passed that House.

Mr. AUSTIN. May I ask the gentleman from New York a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. AUSTIN. Why does not the gentleman include the river and harbor bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not a general supply bill. It is not a bill that is essential for the support of the Government. It can be brought in as a privileged bill and taken up and passed. The purpose of including these four appropriation bills, however, is to enable the House to pass them in the identical form in which they passed the last House. This follows the practice adopted four years ago, in the first session of the Sixty-third Congress, when the bills that failed at the end of the Sixty-second Congress were passed under practically a similar resolution, although only a majority vote was required to pass them.

Mr. AUSTIN. The river and harbor appropriations are absolutely needed after the 1st of July.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It may be that conditions will be such that some changes may be proposed. The House may wish to consider those changes.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York whether, when these bills are passed under suspension of the rules and are sent to the Senate and are amended by the Senate very materially, as I presume they will be, it is the intention to consider the additions made by the Senate in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, or whether the right of consideration of any considerable additions is to be taken away from the House and the additions so made considered only in conference?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, so far as the two bills which were reported from the Committee on Appropriations are concerned, I wish to say to the gentleman that if the Senate should amend them in any material respect I should expect the House to have an opportunity to consider such amendments. The gentleman is aware that the bills can not go to conference without consideration in the Committee of the Whole except by unanimous consent.

Mr. MADDEN. I realize that; but I wish to inquire whether there will be any effort to send them to conference without giving the House an opportunity to consider any important additions to the bills?

Mr. FITZGERALD. If there should be amendments of any importance, the desire will be to have the House consider them before action is taken. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I did not listen to the reading of the resolution or the motion offered by the gentleman from New York. I just glanced at it. It is not, as I understand, the same motion of which the gentleman submitted a draft to me several days ago. It now provides the right to suspend the rules and pass the various appropriation bills. The proposition now before the House is identically the same as that which I discussed at the Republican meeting Saturday night. It could not be taken partisan advantage of. It proposes to give the right to suspend the rules for 10 days to pass these four appropriation bills which belong to the last Congress. A motion to suspend the rules requires a two-thirds vote in order that it shall prevail; so that by agreeing to this resolution this side of the House will not give to the other side of the House any partisan advantage of passing a bill by a majority vote. Whether these bills will be passed in the identical form that we passed them in the last House, or whether the Committee on Military Affairs will recommend to the House the passage of the bill which increases the appropriations for the Army up to a war footing I do not know; but, at any rate, I think this side of the House is safe to vote for the resolution as it was included in the motion that was made this afternoon in regard to the rules for which we have already voted.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to appear critical, but I think at least one or two observations ought to be made on this resolution. Primarily, I wish to say to the membership that it does not include the river and harbor bill. Gentlemen who are appreciative of the economic and commercial interests of the country will understand that that bill is of sufficient importance to deserve and receive the consideration of this House at all times. It is not an orphan as an appropriation bill. If there shall be an interim of one year without a river and harbor bill, it will mean a loss of several million dollars to the Federal Government. There will be a deterioration in the plants owned by the Government, dredging and other plants; there will be a disorganization of the forces; there will be a deterioration of works of construction under improvement. The economic or commercial interests of the country demand that a river and harbor bill shall be passed at this extraordinary session of the Congress.

I merely desired to bring this to the attention of the Congress and to Members who are interested in the maintenance of river and harbor improvement and the further construction of necessary improvements. It is a privileged bill, and if it shall meet the pleasure of the House the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, at least speaking the will of this Member, will at a future time ask the House to consider this important bill with a view to avoid an interim of one year and a loss of millions of dollars to the great works of improvement now under construction in different sections of the country.

It seemed to me that this was of sufficient importance—while this resolution is brought to the attention of the House at what I think is an unseemly hour and might have been left over until to-morrow——

Mr. FITZGERALD. It would not be in order to-morrow; it would not be in order until two weeks from to-day.

Mr. SMALL. We have a Committee on Rules that could have made it in order at any time. I do not desire to be unduly critical in that respect, but I do think that it is a matter to be inquired into why the river and harbor bill was omitted from this resolution on appropriation bills to be submitted to the House for consideration under suspension of rules?

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. Does not the gentleman think that the public-buildings bill should be included?

Mr. SMALL. Let that bill stand on its own merits.

Mr. BURNETT. It has more merit than many others.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the resolution.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the resolution was agreed to.

DEATH OF THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE CYRUS ADAMS SULLOWAY.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Speaker, it becomes my distressing duty at this time to announce to the House the sudden death of my colleague from New Hampshire, Hon. CYRUS ADAMS SULLOWAY, which occurred in the city of Washington on the morning of March 11 last. It is not my purpose at this time to utter words of eulogy consistent with his life and character and his many years of membership in this House. At some future day I shall ask the House to designate a time when the membership of the House can attend to that solemn duty. At this time I move the adoption of the following resolutions, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 21.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. CYRUS ADAMS SULLOWAY, a Representative from the State of New Hampshire.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The resolutions were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the remaining resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect this House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Accordingly, in conformance with the resolution (at 9 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, April 3, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 3, 1917.

Rev. J. L. Kibler, of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

O Thou God of all grace, we stretch forth our hands unto Thee. May our steps this day be ordered by the Lord. Grant, O Lord God, to lead us in a plain path this day. We have reached the serious point in our international relations which we have neither sought nor desired, but which we have with amazing patience sought to avert. We put our trust in Thy mighty arm.

Our fathers trusted Thee and rejoiced in Thy abounding mercies. Thou hast given us peace and freedom and prosperity. Thou hast delivered us from the perils of the past and preserved the unity of our great Republic. Thou hast been our refuge and portion through all the years. Leave us not, neither forsake us, O Thou God of our salvation. May we continue to realize the source whence cometh our help, and lest we forget may we now humble ourselves under Thy mighty hand, and may we find our exaltation in Thy power and grace.

Through the critical stages of this day guide Thy servants in Congress. Lead them in the way that Thou shalt choose. May they hear the voice of Him who spake as never man spake, and at Thy bidding may they go forth to do Thy righteous will.

We pray that Thou wouldst strengthen the hands of our President in meeting the great responsibilities that are laid upon him, and may he have the unlimited support of our great Nation.

O Thou God of nations, hear our prayer in this momentous hour, and grant that the issues of this day may have the seal of the divine sanction and be upheld by Thy almighty power. In the name of Jesus Christ our Savior we make our plea. Amen.

Whereas the laws of the United States impose on all citizens the duty of performing military service in time of war; and

Whereas the volunteer system imposes the burden of that duty upon the few who are patriotic enough to recognize their obligations and enables many others to evade a duty equally incumbent upon them:

Resolved, That this general assembly urge upon the Federal Congress the passage of such legislation as will distribute equally among all citizens able to perform it the burden of military service.

Passed senate March 30, 1917.

Passed house of representatives March 30, 1917.

STATE OF CONNECTICUT,
Office of the Secretary, ss:

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of record in this office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of said State at Hartford this 30th day of March, A. D. 1917.

[SEAL.] R. J. DWYER,
Deputy Secretary.

Mr. THOMPSON. I present resolutions adopted at different meetings in the State of Kansas regarding the pending crisis. They are short, and I ask that they may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of the citizens of Atchison, Kans., March 29, 1917.

Be it resolved by this popular assemblage of the citizens of the city of Atchison and vicinity, That we view with satisfaction the severance of diplomatic relations with any foreign sovereignty whose lust for world power jeopardizes those sacred liberties for which our forefathers so valiantly fought, and should such action result in an appeal to the arbitrament of the sword, we know that our country, asylum as it is for the downtrodden and oppressed of all nations, will put on a new nationalism and, as it has ever done in the past, stand forth as the valiant champion of liberty and freedom on sea and on land; and be it further

Resolved, That the reversion to barbarism, evidenced by relentless and indiscriminate submarine warfare, clearly demonstrates that the price of peace, liberty, and civilization is the ability to defend them else they perish from the earth; and be it further

Resolved, That irrespective of race, creed, or party we unqualifiedly indorse the action of President Woodrow Wilson in severing relations with Germany and arming American vessels for defense against unlawful attacks and calling Congress together in extraordinary session, and we express the fervent hope that when Congress convenes it will realize that the priceless heritage of all our people is the privilege of supporting their own Government in its hour of need, and that this patriotic privilege and duty should be exercised by all who enjoy its blessings: And therefore be it

Resolved, That we respectfully recommend to the consideration of Congress that, as soon as it shall assemble, it shall do all things necessary or expedient to protect the honor, dignity, and safety of our country; that it provide by law for universal military training, with obligation of service in time of war; that it provide, as promptly as possible, an Army, a Navy, coast defense, military and naval equipment sufficient in all things to enable the United States to defend itself against any force which Germany or any other sovereignty may send against us; and that in this crisis no time be lost, effort or expense spared in the mobilization of the military, naval, and industrial strength of the Nation; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the President of the United States and each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Resolutions adopted at assembly of 25,000 representative citizens of Kansas and Missouri at Convention Hall, Kansas City, Mo., Saturday, March 24, 1917.

Be it resolved by this assembly in Convention Hall, Kansas City, Mo., of 25,000 representative citizens of Missouri and Kansas, That it is our plain duty as citizens of the United States, without regard to nativity or political conviction, to consecrate, and we do hereby consecrate, our persons and property to the service of our Government in the protection and defense of our homes, of our right to continue to enjoy the blessings of a democratic form of government, established and maintained by the people for the people, and of the rights secured to us by the laws of nations upon the high seas.

And we pledge to the President, the Congress, and Government our support in the accomplishment of these sacred purposes; and be it further

Resolved, That we do hereby approve the action of President Wilson in severing relations with Germany and arming American vessels for their defense against unlawful attack and in calling Congress together in extraordinary session.

We respectfully recommend to the consideration of Congress that as soon as it shall assemble it shall do all things necessary or expedient to protect the honor, dignity, and safety of our country; that it provide by law for universal military training with obligation of service in time of war; that it provide, as promptly as possible, an Army, a Navy, coast defense, military and naval equipment sufficient in all things to enable the United States to defend itself against any force which Germany or any other sovereignty may send against us; and that in this crisis no time be lost, effort or expense spared, in the mobilization of the military, naval, and industrial strength of the Nation; and be it further

Resolved, That in the line of our duty to ourselves and to the Government we will aid and encourage the immediate organization of complete and efficient local military and naval units and maintain such organizations so long as the Government needs them.

Resolutions adopted at meeting of Kansas Democratic State Committee at Topeka, Kans., March 31, 1917.

Resolved by the Democratic State Committee in meeting assembled, That we heartily indorse the policy and administration of our great President, Woodrow Wilson, and especially his policy with reference to foreign relations. We approve his action in severing diplomatic relations with Germany and feel that in this crisis of our Nation all citizens, irrespective of party, should uphold his action. We urge our Representatives in Congress, in special session assembled April 2, to sustain and uphold any course and policy which he requests or may call upon for adoption to the end of upholding the honor and glory of our country.

Mr. HUSTING. I present a telegram embodying a resolution, and I ask that it may be read.

The Secretary read the telegram, as follows:

MADISON, WIS., March 31, 1917.

Senator PAUL HUSTING,
Washington, D. C.:

Fifteen thousand citizens of Madison marched this day in a grand loyalty parade, and in a mass meeting which followed these resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Since the declarations of war in Europe two and a half years ago the United States of America has seen the danger of being drawn into the war grow constantly more imminent. The Nation has hoped not to be forced into this wicked, wanton, and wasteful conflict; it has tried to be neutral, but more and more the impossibility of such a position became obvious. With a patience that has been subjected to criticism the President of the United States has tolerated insult to our flag and intrigue against our peace. Our Government has suffered deliberate attacks. Upon the loss of American lives we have been forced to break off all semblance of friendly relations with the German Government. We have withdrawn our ambassador from Berlin, and we have returned to Germany her diplomatic representatives at Washington. We have been confronted with a formal declaration by the imperial power of Germany that she will attack and sink without warning any American vessel which pursues its lawful calling upon the high seas without German consent. The time has passed when we are called upon to consider only what are our commercial rights. The time has come when we are forced to consider what is our duty to ourselves, to humanity, and to the future of the world. The struggle is between autocracy and democracy. The destiny of mankind lies in the balance. Autocracy shall not rule the world: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, citizens of Madison, Wis., stand unitedly with the President of the United States, by the Government of the United States, and for the perpetuation of the democracy which was bequeathed to us by the brave builders of our Nation.

Resolved further, That we, citizens of Madison, Wis., the capital of a great American Commonwealth, stand unitedly with American citizens everywhere for the triumph of a liberal constitutional form of government in the Eastern as in the Western Hemisphere.

Resolved further, That we stand committed as American citizens to universal military training as the only means of safeguarding and permanently establishing that democracy in the world which will make possible peace and safety for all nations great and small.

Resolved further, That we pledge our consecrated devotion to the cause of world-wide democracy and to the destruction of military autocracy, believing this the only path to permanent peace.

Resolved further, That it is the sense of this meeting that the people of the United States, rejoicing in the triumph of democracy in Russia, should aid and encourage her in every possible way to preserve and develop liberal institutions, recognizing as we do that this revolution is a great advance toward the time when all the Governments of Europe shall be of the people, by the people, and for the people. Be it further

Resolved, That whatever measures Congress and the President may find necessary to adopt to maintain the rights, dignity, honor, and liberties of this country we as American citizens hereby pledge our undivided and loyal support March 31, 1917.

Mr. HUSTING. I present resolutions adopted by several thousand citizens of Janesville, Wis., expressing loyalty to the Government and pledging support.

I also present a petition adopted at a mass meeting, consisting of over 4,000 people, held at Fond du Lac, Wis., expressing loyalty and pledging support to the Government.

I further present a petition signed by 17 citizens of Racine, Wis., expressing loyalty and pledging support to the Government.

I also present a telegram in the nature of a petition from citizens of Reedsburg, Wis., expressing loyalty and pledging support to the Government.

I further present a resolution adopted by the Bar Association of Marathon County, Wis., pledging support and expressing loyalty to the Government.

I also present a telegram signed by 451 women of the city of Milwaukee, Wis., expressing loyalty and pledging support to the Government to the extent of their ability.

I further present petitions signed by several hundred citizens of Grand Rapids, Milwaukee, and Campbellsport, Wis., praying for peace. I ask that these several telegrams, petitions, and resolutions be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the telegrams, petitions, and resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LOYALTY MEETING, JANESVILLE, WIS.

Our Nation is facing a crisis. War looms dark on the horizon and threatens our peace. Not since Lincoln called the country to arms in defense of its integrity and unity has there been such a critical time for our Government.

Our President has borne great burdens. He has carried himself with fine poise and remarkable self-control. His patience has been sublime. We have the highest admiration for his character and unswerving faith in his ability, his patriotism, and his consecration to the welfare of mankind. We are here to pledge to him our united and enthusiastic loyalty.

We do this as a citizenship of many types and sprung from many lands. In days of national stress like the present, when defenseless American citizens on the high seas are asking our Government and the American people for protection, we should declare our allegiance to our country. We invite all, from the humblest citizen to the highest official, emphatically and publicly to declare their American patriotism and their loyalty to the Stars and Stripes: Wherefore be it

Resolved by the people of Janesville, Wis., in patriotic mass meeting assembled on the 30th day of March, 1917, That we unanimously tender our unqualified services and our unstinted resources to the President and his advisers and to the Congress of our country in their efforts to protect the lives and property of our citizens on land and sea, to maintain unsullied our national integrity, to preserve the sacred liberties of our people, and to protect the heritage of our children.

Resolved further, That we dedicate ourselves to the common welfare, to the accomplishment of our high hopes for humanity, and to the alleviation of the suffering of the innocent; that we proclaim our intention of uniting with all loyal citizens in defense of the flag and our unfaltering faith in the God of nations.

Resolved further, That these resolutions be published in the press; that they be forwarded to the President, to the United States Senate, and to the House of Representatives.

FOND DU LAC, WIS., LOYALTY RESOLUTIONS.

Resolutions offered and adopted by the patriotic mass meeting at the armory Thursday evening.

We are assembled as Americans. We are opposed to war except when necessary to defend ourselves or as a last resort. We deeply sympathize with all of the world's suffering millions. We realize that we have been fortunate, and we believe that much of our good fortune is due to our form of government, under which we choose and change our rulers instead of being subject to rulers claiming authority by divine right.

We realize that the liberties and blessings of freedom which the people of this country have enjoyed were purchased for us by the blood of our forefathers and sanctified to our use by their patriotic devotion. Those blessings have come down through the generations to us a sacred trust, and we are most solemnly bound to preserve that trust and to pass it on to future generations.

We have welcomed and given sanctuary to the oppressed of all the world without reference to rank, race, or creed. We have been, and we should be, impartial as between those born here and those coming to us. We have welcomed all, and we have shared equally with all. The duty then lies upon all to share equally in the burdens of holding our soil, defending our homes, and protecting our people.

We have chosen representatives from among us, and we have vested them with authority. Those representatives clothed with the authority which we have given them, constitute our Government. The official decisions of those representatives are our laws. All loyal citizens obey the laws. We have a right to debate and to oppose any and every proposed decision until it has been made. After decisions have been made, and while they are in force, our duty is to obey. Our Congress has sole power to declare war. Our President is the executive head of our Government. When acting as such, we are bound to support and obey him, and we are bound to support and obey all subordinate executive officials.

We all trace our ancestry to nations involved in this war, and, as between those nations, our sympathies are naturally colored by the lines of our ancestry. We are not, here and now, concerned in questions as between other nations, but we are most deeply concerned with all questions between our Nation and every other nation.

Our Government has been and is unable to peaceably secure the rights of our people. We deeply regret that, despite all efforts to avoid it, there is imminent danger of war between the United States of America and the central powers of Europe.

At the time of this dire crisis in our national life, unwarranted question seems to have arisen as to loyalty among Wisconsin citizens. In answer to all such questions, we, the people of Wisconsin, in Fond du Lac and vicinity, assembled in mass meeting, on this 29th day of March, 1917, invite attention to the record for loyalty to the United States shown by the citizens of Wisconsin in every war and through every crisis. Race lines have never divided us in our loyalty to the United States of America, and race lines do not divide that loyalty now. The sons of Wisconsin still stand as one man against any nation at war with the United States of America. We say to our President, when need comes, call for us men of Wisconsin; we will live up to our record.

We reaffirm our undivided allegiance to our country, to our President, and to our flag. We assert our readiness to undertake any duty required of us.

We earnestly urge that the work toward preparedness be continued with the most diligent energy until we are adequately equipped to defend against war with any nation.

We feel that we should be so prepared that we may protect ourselves from aggression and be strong enough to influence for the good of humanity the conferences of the nations.

We recommend the adoption of a plan for universal and compulsory military training and service.

We are resolved and we pledge ourselves to stand as united and loyal citizens. With "malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right, as God gives us to see the right," we will serve our country; we will follow our flag.

RACINE, WIS., March 30, 1917.

Hon. PAUL O. HUSTING,
Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Bryan's telegram to the Members of the Senate and House and the propagandas of the Emergency Peace Federation and other pacifists do not voice the sentiment of those who voted for President Wilson.

The President was reelected because he could be depended upon to do the right thing at the proper time, and that right thing now is a call upon Congress to destroy the menace of Prussianism.

Universal military training, war with Germany, an alliance with and financial aid to France and her allies are the desire of a large majority of the citizens of Racine.

HONORABLE SIRS: This is to advise you that in our opinion we would consider it very disastrous for our country to be involved in any war. We are positively against any action against any foreign country and we do not want war.

ARPIN, WIS., March 31, 1917.

Hon. Senator HUSTING,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: We are citizens, to our very heart loyal to our dear country. We believe that loyalty to this our dear country to-day consists in agitating peace. We do not care to shed our blood nor the blood of our boys for Morgan & Co., Wall Street, and private interests. We want peace with honor, rather than war with dishonor. In the name of humanity we want peace. Should any foreign power threaten to invade our dear country, then we are willing to war to the last drop of blood, but under no circumstance to save the millions of the abovementioned. The press of to-day does not express our sentiment. We are told by the press that our honorable President wants the sentiment of the people. We hereby express ours. We implore the Almighty for peace.

Very respectfully, yours,

Mr. HUSTING subsequently said: Mr. President, in order to avoid any misapprehension, I desire to say that I have received a great many letters and telegrams from individuals, societies, and committees in my State in favor of supporting the President. I have also received a large number of letters and telegrams from individuals, societies, and committees in my State praying for peace, and urging that war may be averted. I make this statement in order to supplement the introduction of the resolutions that I have presented this morning.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I have received thousands of letters and telegrams touching upon the question of peace and war. I have selected only a few of them, which I present and ask to have read. I present two telegrams, one from Mr. A. C. Townley, national president Nonpartisan League, and the other embodying a resolution adopted by the Farmers' Nonpartisan Political League of North Dakota, which I ask may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the telegrams, as follows:

FARGO, N. DAK., March 31, 1917.

Senator A. J. GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.:

As president of the Nonpartisan League of North Dakota and the National Nonpartisan League I wish to assure you that the members of this association are patriotic and loyal and will stand by the Nation with their lives and property in case of war; but it is my duty to inform you that the members are unanimous in believing that war can be avoided, and I respectfully petition you and Congress to use every honorable means in accordance with Washington's policy to keep this Nation out of foreign entanglements. The farmers of the Nonpartisan League and the farmers generally throughout the Northwest desire that their Government observe the strictest neutrality and act without favor or prejudice toward any of the unfortunate belligerents in Europe. "Kept us out of war" was a determining factor in the last campaign. The people have not changed their minds while the press of the country may have.

A. C. TOWNLEY,
National President Nonpartisan League.

FARGO, N. DAK., March 31, 1917.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Resolutions below were passed by a vote of members of the Farmers' Nonpartisan Political League of North Dakota, assembled in mass meeting at Grand Forks. The vote of the meeting was 2,000 to 2. Passed amid tremendous enthusiasm, crowd arising. Expressed almost unanimous stand of North Dakota farmers.

Memorial to the President and Congress of the United States.

"Whereas it now appears likely that the United States of America may be forced in defense of the lives, property, and honor of her people to meet force with force; and

"Whereas citizens in all walks of life owe it to our Nation to give it support in such a crisis, even to the giving of life itself; and

"Whereas vast amounts of property and money must be used by our Government to prosecute such defense effectually in the hope of forever preventing the necessity of recourse to arms in the future:

"Now, therefore, we do hereby declare it to be our firm and unalterable purpose to support our Government in case of war with our lives and our property as far as need be, and, being mindful of the principles of equity, justice, and freedom, upon which this our Government is founded, do most earnestly recommend and request that the Congress of the United States immediately pass an act to compel those having property useful to the Government for the carrying on of war to surrender the same to the Government of the United States to be used during the war, such property to include factories, shipyards, munitions plants, armor-plate mills, flour mills, arms factories, packing plants, supplies and equipment, cloth factories, steel mills, and iron mines, and such other property and money as the Government may require, to the end that all our citizens, regardless of social position or economic advantage, shall contribute equally and fully to the common need and common defense of our common humanity and that citizens of wealth may thus be enabled to contribute of individual sacrifice to the common welfare of their country on the same terms as the enlisted soldier and sailor give of their lives, such law to contain provisions that no payment shall be rendered to anyone for the use of property necessary to the carrying on of said war, the residue, however, thereof to be returned to such individual owners at the close of the war without compensation of any kind for the use or taking except the national recognition of their having contributed to the defense of human liberty and the country's honor and security.

"We do therefore most earnestly urge that such legislation be enacted to be automatically put in force upon a declaration of war, to the end that justice, equality, and fraternity shall be fostered and upheld as between our own people in the conduct of the defense of our common honor, lives, and property."

Done this 30th day of March, 1917.

A. C. TOWNLEY,
President Nonpartisan League.

Kindly confer with Senator LA FOLLETTE.

Mr. GRONNA. I also present a telegram, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senator A. J. GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.:

We, the undersigned citizens of the United States, hereby protest against the shipping of foodstuffs to the warring nations of Europe, against the arming of our merchant vessels on the high seas, and that instead we urgently request that our Navy be employed to convoy foodstuffs to the neutral nations first.

P. M. WALKER, M. D.,
St. Thomas, N. Dak.
JOHN A. DUNN,
Park River, N. Dak.
JOHN B. MOONEY,
Langdon, N. Dak.

We approve your stand. The people want peace and are opposed to the administration's prowar policy.

Mr. GRONNA. I have also received a number of telegrams and letters praying for peace, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams and letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LANGDON, N. DAK., March 31, 1917.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR GRONNA: This letter anticipates that at the call of the President you will be on hand at Washington for the duties that fall upon you. It is a serious time, but a time for coolness and self-possession.

I am certain that the same courage that prompted you to stand with the minority in resisting the "armed-neutrality" proposition will still enable you to permit the future years of the country determine your present actions.

This letter, which not only represents my own personal feelings but also the majority of my congregation, and also not a few among the other citizens of Langdon, is written to encourage every possible move that can prevent war. We all know that Germany has wronged us. We have a just, deep grievance; but the argument from the Dark Ages and from the jungle that this is to be interpreted as a just cause for declaring war ought to find our Nation firmly rejecting. The Savior's significant utterance, "All that take the sword shall perish with the sword," should cause our patriotism to move us to denounce and reject the argument of armaments which has proved an implement of suicide to the past nations that have resorted to its power.

I trust that America will have the patience and good sense to wait until the war passion of the world has subsided, when calmer justice will be possible, when an agreeable compensation for the wrong we have suffered can be better effected. To declare war upon Germany, or even to declare that a state of war exists, will but add dignity to Germany's wrong. The world sentiment of justice and equity can best be awakened as the force armaments are withheld.

If these suggestions seem reasonable to you, and you have any suggestions to make as to how in a small way I may be helpful to carrying them out, I shall be happy for the opportunity to do so.

Yours for a patriotism that will not bring the hazards of war, I am,
Sincerely,

GEO. C. LEE.

WILMER, ALA., March 28, 1917.

Senator GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Please use your influence to keep the country out of war. Demand that the people be allowed to say by referendum whether they shall have war or not, for the people do not want war. Also demand that there be an embargo put on all munitions of war to all belligerent nations, and that there also be an embargo placed on all foodstuffs, for we need the food at home. Feed America and Americans first, and forbid Americans and American ships from going into the war zone except at their own risk.

Yours, truly,
A. S. BROWN.

P. S.—Please send me any speeches you may make or may have made.

CHICAGO, ILL., April 3, 1917.

Hon. ASLE J. GRONNA,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

This administration was elected upon a peace platform. Therefore we must now be true to the people and not precipitate war before ascertaining by a referendum vote whether or not the people want war, otherwise no belligerent act of any European nation could be compared in the injury done our country with this dishonor and betrayal of our Republic. We must not betray the people's trust; for if we do, this Nation's blood will be upon our hands. By all means demand that the Nation shall have a referendum vote.

DEAR SIR: Last night we sent the inclosed copy of telegram to the President. In this telegram you will note that you and every other Member of Congress were included. We now take this means of making the same appeal to you personally.

Yours, truly,
EARL BROS.

CHICAGO, March 30, 1917.

President WILSON,
Washington, D. C.:

We hope that you, as President, together with Congress, as representatives of this God-given Republic, will see to it that such a Republic is not forced, contrary to its wishes, into a mercenary war, nor compelled to go down in history with such a stigma attached.

EARL BROS.

WHY WE SHOULD NOT HAVE WAR.

This is a time when we should be calm and weigh everything with the greatest of thought and care, and not be swayed by speeches from those who would lead us, if they could, into what most all of Europe is passing through at the present time.

The first thing to consider and study, in going to war, is the food problem—whether we are well provided to feed our soldiers and also the poor of our country. Are we?

Our cold storages and warehouses are short of most everything in the food line, compared with a year ago. This is due to short crops and a big export demand brought about by the European war, which has forced prices so high that the people are complaining bitterly of the high cost of living, and the extremely poor are barely existing.

How would it be if we went to war? Would not the situation be much worse than it is now?

Would we not draw men from the farms, thereby curtailing farm labor and creating a still greater shortage of food products? Would not this create still higher prices than exist to-day?

If war were declared, would we not be compelled to feed the allies, in a large way, whether we could spare it or not? Would not this also create a higher cost of living?

How could the wives and children of soldiers drawn into the Army live on about $4 per week paid to them by the Government? This is not even half of what a servant girl is getting.

Would not all this bring on misery and discontent to say nothing of the poor soldiers who would lose their lives?

Our present trouble has been brought about by the loss of lives of those who were previously warned not to take any chances in the war zone on English ships or forbidden lane and by the sinking of three of our ships. This, of course, is a great wrong, but as the German fleet is bottled up would it not be wise to just thoroughly arm our merchant ships and let the allies do the same? Would not this place us in a position to cope with the submarines if they made an attack? Why not give it a trial before plunging ourselves into this terrible war unprepared?

We should go on preparing so if any foreign power should invade our shores we would be in position to protect ourselves.

They have brought on this uncivilized war, why not let them finish it? The cost would be too great for us to get mixed up in it, besides everything points to an early close among themselves.

If we can evade war it should be a peace lesson never to be forgotten by foreign powers.

It is better to be called a coward with judgment than a rash fighter.

Member Boston Fruit & Produce Exchange.

DEAR SIR: Complying with a motion unanimously passed by the Minneapolis Trades and Labor Assembly (the central labor organization of this city representing close to 100 labor unions with a membership of 18,000), I was instructed to commend you for your noble stand for peace and against war in the interest of the great common people of this Nation, in the face of the opposition of the "prostitute press," the munition manufacturers, and profit patriots that dominate Congress.

CHICAGO, March 31, 1917.

Senator A. J. GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I do not believe the newspapers of the United States convey the general sentiment of the big majority of the American people.

I think the United States can well afford to keep out of that war zone in Europe. I believe in preparing for war, but I do not believe in doing it on such a reckless, extravagant, and gigantic scale and rushing pell-mell into it without any regard to expenses and consequences.

There are many real good reasons why the United States should not get into war with Germany, unless there is more cause than there is now. Just because there are many nations in war is no good reason why the United States must get into the business of doing bloody murder.

I would like to know if you think this country should help the allies whip Germany and send some of our best young men more than 3,000 miles to help the allies win a victory when we have more than enough for all of our men to do at home. If they really must fight, they can practice up on Mexico.

My father was in the Civil War, and in several battles, and he was sick for a year after he was sent home, because the Army surgeon said that on account of a bullet wound in one of his lungs and another one in one of his legs he could not live very long. I heard him tell about the horrors of war several times before he died.

I know that it is not necessary for the United States at this time to get into war with Germany. I would rather my boys would be out on some good farms and be thoroughly alive than be dead heroes on the battle fields of war. If the men and women generally insist upon going to war with Germany, Congress and the President might insist upon the fellows who are selling the ammunition and war supplies enlisting first. If the United States must go to war with Germany, I suggest that they do it independently of any other nation.

Supposing our ships keep out of that war zone and let the European war dogs fight it out among themselves.

I believe in going right along and preparing for war, but not at a breakneck speed, without any consideration of what the outcome will be at this time.

We dropped the argument with Germany some time ago, and she will be making some new offers. I think we lost a big part of our prestige abroad soon after the war began. We should have been more aggressive and we should have commenced preparing for war before the Lusitania was sunk.

We have no business to loan the allies money without interest. Our business should be firm and businesslike and we should remain a dignified neutral.

I believe in the freedom of the seas for all nations, of course, and England should have no more right to the seas than we or Germany.

We can arm and remain neutral and keep out of war, and thus keep far ahead of the nations now at war. We should warn our people of the horrors of war instead of rushing them in now, when we have nothing to go to war about.

If we must have war, I am willing to serve in a regular army, but many of our young men and middle-aged men and their families should be out on some good, productive farms producing the necessities with which to maintain life and keep up a large standing army.

If we want to bring down the high cost of living, we should urge good men and women to get on to good farms and stay there and raise wheat, rye, barley, oats, peas, beans, onions, potatoes, beef, mutton, pork, ham and eggs, butter and cheese. It is highly important that we have many more food producers than to try and get every able-bodied man to get into war.

Yours, very truly,

WM. H. BROWN.

Hon. A. GRONNA,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

RESPECTED SIR: In the name of my two congregations at Courtenay and Wimbledon, N. Dak., numbering some 200 souls, I wish to communicate to you the following:

1. Not a single man, wife, or child of my congregations wants our beloved country to enter the present world war.

2. We see no warrant for our declaring war against Germany without taking like action against England, because both are guilty of violations of American rights under international law.

3. We insist upon that a way out of the present crisis be found without loss of honor and without perpetrating what would be an act of unneutrality and injustice.

4. We will stand by you now and always in resisting any usurpation of what the Constitution makes the sole right of Congress, the making and declaring of war.

I might add that for weeks I have tried to fathom the sentiment of our community, and I must say that there is absolutely no clamor for war; on the contrary, everybody desires peace.

Knowing the great difficulties besetting our Congressmen in this national emergency, we pray to God to give you moral courage and wisdom to do and act for the welfare, honor, and glory of our beloved Nation and the advancement of true humanity.

Last, but not least, I wish to express my admiration and gratitude for the stand you took recently against armed neutrality.

Very respectfully,

Rev. C. H. LUEKER, Jr.

GREENWOOD, MISS., April 1, 1917.

Hon. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS,
Washington, D. C.:

Please convey to the President the following resolutions of Greenwood Elks:

"Whereas Germany has repeatedly since the outbreak of the present European conflict committed acts of war against the United States by ruthless destruction of the property and lives of American citizens on the high seas in violation of international law and the principles of humanity; and

"Whereas Germany has recently in insolent defiance of the United States notified them that these illegal outrages will be continued deliberately and systematically unless American citizens and merchant ships are altogether kept off certain large designated areas of the high seas, and has since such notice without any provocation attacked and destroyed at least five such ships, thereby causing the death of a number of American citizens, showing that she fully purposes to follow up the word with the deed; and

"Whereas Germany has in various other ways committed acts of hostility against the United States, notably by the Zimmerman note, which sought to involve the United States in war with the friendly powers of Mexico and Japan with a view to the actual territorial dismemberment of the United States; and

"Whereas these acts of Germany are derogatory to the dignity and honor of the United States, destructive of the dearest rights of American citizens, and are in a high degree insulting to the American people and fraught with peril to their vital interests and safety: Therefore be it

"Resolved unanimously by Lodge No. 854, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, That it is the sense of the lodge that the United States should at once meet this illegal and insulting and aggressive warlike course of Germany with appropriate aggressive action by a declaration of war against Germany and the speedy and vigorous prosecution of the war with every resource at their command, and that to this end a complete and comprehensive scheme of preparedness shall be accomplished as quickly as practicable, one feature of which shall be the adoption of a system of universal compulsory military training along the lines recommended by the General Staff of the Army of the United States; and that the United States shall cooperate with France and her allies in the manner most practicable to the end that the complete military defeat of Germany may be brought about, the vital interest and safety of the American Nation so requiring. In this the lodge pledges to the President and Congress their sympathy, loyalty, and active support."

[From the Sunday Times-Union, Jacksonville, Fla., Apr. 1, 1917.]

MASS MEETING OF THE CITY'S BEST CITIZENS VOTED TO ACCEPT GAGE OF BATTLE THROWN DOWN BY GERMANY—1,800 PEOPLE CHEER PATRIOTIC SPEECHES TO ECHO IN COUNTY ARMORY—PLEDGE UNITED SUPPORT TO PRESIDENT WILSON—DEMAND PASSAGE BY CONGRESS OF UNIVERSAL MILITARY TRAINING BILL AT ONCE.

By unanimous vote the citizens of Jacksonville who attended the big patriotic mass meeting in the armory last evening voted to accept Germany's gage of battle and resist all aggression until a victorious peace is secured. The vote was taken upon the adoption of a resolution calling upon Congress to pass a universal military training bill. The entire meeting was one of the most enthusiastic ever held in the city. Nearly one-half of the audience was composed of women, and they were the most enthusiastic.

The meeting was called to order by Mayor J. E. T. Bowden. He stated the purpose of the meeting and informed the audience that similar mass meetings were being held all over the country. He then introduced John E. Hartridge as the presiding officer of the evening. Mr. Hartridge declared that he could think of nothing better to say than to paraphrase the speech of Patrick Henry, which was delivered before the Virginia House of Delegates in 1775.

MR. HARTRIDGE'S SPEECH.

Mr. Hartridge spoke as follows:

"The question before us is one of awful moment to this country. And what have we to oppose to Germany? Shall we try argument? We have been trying that for the last two and one-half years. Have we anything new to offer on the subject? Nothing. We have held the subject up in every light of which it is capable, but it has been all in vain.

"Shall we resort to entreaty and humble supplication? What terms shall we find which have not been already exhausted? Let us not, I beseech you, deceive ourselves longer. We have done everything that could be done to avert the storm which is now coming on.

"We have reasoned; we have remonstrated; we have argued; we have humbled ourselves. All have been slighted; our remonstrances have produced additional violence and insult; our arguments and appeals have been disregarded, and we have been spurned with contempt. In vain, after these things, may we indulge the fond hope of peace and reconciliation. There is no longer any room for hope.

"If we wish to continue, if we mean to preserve inviolate those inestimable privileges for which we have fought; if we mean not basely to abandon our rights, surrender the principles upon which our Government is founded and which we have pledged ourselves never to abandon, we must fight. I repeat it, we must fight. An appeal to arms and to the God of Hosts is all that is left us.

"They tell us that we are weak; unable to cope with so formidable an adversary. But when shall we be stronger? Will it be the next week or the next year? Will it be when we are totally disarmed and when a German guard shall be stationed in every house? Shall we gather strength by irresolution and inaction? Shall we acquire the means of effectual resistance by lying supinely on our backs and hugging the delusive phantom of hope until our enemies shall have bound us hand and foot?

"We are not weak, if we make a proper use of the means which the God of nature hath placed in our power. One hundred millions of people armed in the holy cause of liberty, and in such a country as that which we possess, are invincible by any force which our enemy can send against us. Besides, we shall not fight our battles alone.

"There is a just God who presides over the destinies of nations, and who has raised up friends to fight our battles with us. The battle is not to the strong alone; it is to the vigilant, the active, the brave.

"Besides, we have no election.

"If we were base enough to desire it, it is now too late to retire from the contest.

"There is no retreat but in submission and degradation. Our chains are being forged.

"Their clanking may be heard upon the sounding sea, and the justness of our cause seen in sinking ships, destroyed property, smoking industries, and murdered citizens. The war is inevitable, and let it come. I repeat it, let it come.

"It is in vain to extenuate the matter. Gentlemen may cry peace, peace, but there is no peace. The war is actually begun. The next gale that sweeps from the sea will bring to our ears the clash of resounding arms. Our brethren are already in the field.

"Why stand we here idle? What is it that the people wish? What would they have? Is life so dear or peace so sweet as to be purchased at the price of chains and slavery? Forbid it, Almighty God.

"'I know not what course others may take; but as for me, give me liberty or give me death.'"

ADDRESS BY BISHOP CURLEY.

The Right Rev. M. J. Curley, D. D., bishop of St. Augustine, was the first speaker introduced by Mr. Hartridge. He delivered a most masterful and eloquent address, appealing to the patriotism of the people.

He spoke as follows:

"Mr. Chairman and fellow citizens, I stand on this platform to-night as an American citizen, knowing but one land—America—loving and ready to serve but one flag—the Stars and Stripes. I spurn every accusation of divided allegiance. This land of freedom has it all, and it is offered to-night to him whose hand is steady on the rudder of the ship of state, Woodrow Wilson. May the God of the nations guide him.

"For now over 30 long months we have watched being waged on European fields the greatest war the world has ever known; we have seen nation after nation hurl itself into the fray; we have seen the god of war twist peoples out of shape, ruin commerce, level cities, sweeping away as by torrent force great works of art; we have seen innocent men and women made homeless, sent adrift as exiles; we have seen millions wear the garb of mourners, tearful wives and mothers, fatherless babes; we have seen the gaunt specter of famines stalk through once wealthy nations, and, worst of all, we have seen the flower of Europe's manhood laid low, mangled, shattered, unrecognizable, consumed by flame, riddled by shot and shell, hurled and huddled by tens of thousands into graves far from their loved ones. We have seen it all—stunned, shocked, thrilled, unable to grasp the conflict's extent. Neutrality was proclaimed and preserved under conditions the most trying ever experienced by this Nation. There were critics abroad. There were men who cried aloud, "To-morrow we shall be involved," and there were men who were heard proclaiming that, come what may, we must not enter into the conflict—the professional pacifists. God save the Nation from them.

"America remembered what her first President said about entangling alliances. There was no question of her taking sides. She stood independent and apart, and she did stand so even though men said she swayed now one way and now another. Looking back in clear perspective, we see her one and apart—America and America only. She made overtures to the blood-mad combatants; she sent relief wherever she could to the poor and famished victims of strife. She was patient at times under dire provocation now from one party to the fray, now from another. But whilst patient her voice rang clear asserting American rights and whenever America fights for American rights, the world will know that America is right, the world will know why and for what America fights.

FIGHT OR SURRENDER.

"Years have gone by. The tension has become greater. American lives have been lost, American commerce crippled. To-day we stand face to face with the great question 'What shall we do; fight or surrender right?' Surrender? Never!

"Monday shall witness the coming together of the Nation's Representatives in solemn council. The Nation shall hear the voice of its head, and the Nation shall obey. We await that decision. Meantime, we must prepare! It is no time to prepare or discuss preparation when we are being throttled. If we sit down idly and wait till then we shall be given an opportunity to do one thing only—to beg for our lives. Need I say that the preparation should have been made long ago? Now, at least, there is still time—time for national salvation which must be worked out by national preparation.

"We are citizens of a great Republic, and as such we are blessed with many and glorious privileges. But we have duties as well as privileges. We may enjoy our privileges, but no American has a right to enjoy American privileges if he is not prepared to do his duty to this American Republic. This duty we are bound to do by every law of God and man. It follows logically and no man dare deny the conclusion that we must be prepared to do our duty. That duty is one of fighting and if need be dying for America. This preparation calls for training. To-morrow did the call for volunteers go forth, millions would rush to arms, but in spite of their best intentions, these men would not be prepared to take their place in organized, systematic defense. That calls for practically blind obedience, for highly developed discipline, for a knowledge of arms and strategic maneuvers. It calls for training. It took one great nation months running into years to make her men ready. Be prepared therefore before the enemy is at our gates. Locking the stable when the horse is gone is a bad policy in any affair, but particularly so in national affairs, when so much is at stake. I respectfully submit therefore that there is one and only one solution—universal training—universal service. This is preparedness in fact. Had we such, to-morrow not 350,000 men but millions of men could take the field and do so efficiently. There would be no need to await the whipping into shape of eager, willing, but unprepared and inexperienced men, even though we grant that the American volunteer is calculated to prove efficient as an apt pupil in a short time. In the present war, the nation that had to call for volunteers and await their being trained paid the price—and a dear one it was—of voluntary service in the sacrifice of thousands of lives of brave men who looked and cried during the war's early stages for reinforcements—only to hear the answer 'They are not ready yet.'

COMPLETE PREPAREDNESS.

"Let me quote from a recent article on preparedness: 'Only complete preparedness will avail against the nations now ranking as the enemies of democracy; the only democratic means of defense of the democratic ideal lies in universal military service. Not only is it the only democratic means, it is the only means. No defense short of it will defend. Hired armies, half-way armies, are not big enough. Only a nation in arms has a fighting chance against a nation in arms. The United States so armed would have nothing to fear; and, having no imperial aims to gratify, could sit forever at its own fireside intent only upon its real mission, which is to work out within its own borders a better democracy for its own people.'

"This was the spirit actuating the founders of our Nation, and it finds expression in the militia act of May 8, 1792.

"The principle of universal service is nothing new; it is as old as our Government; the principle is there. Whether it be carried into effect under State or Federal supervision is a matter of policy. On this point great men differ.

"We are asked to support a resolution calling on Congress to pass a law making universal service compulsory. That means we are asked to approve action making ourselves ready to do our duty at our country's call when it calls. We are asked to favor legislative action which will enrich, prepare, and build up the young manhood of America, fit it to take its place and to defend American rights and liberties. No man who admits his duty to the Republic can logically object to being prepared to do it. I told that without universal military service and training we can not be prepared. America has a right to expect every man to do his duty. It follows that America has a duty to prepare every man to do it.

SWITZERLAND'S PREPARATION.

"Switzerland has such universal service. With an area of only 15,976 square miles and a population of only three and three-fourths millions she can put on the field to-morrow 539,109. America, with over 100,000,000 people, could send out in our defense to-morrow but 350,000 men. True, in a year she could put a million men in the field. But what might happen to an unprepared nation in a year of warfare? There are 20,000,000 men in the United States of military age—from 18 to 45. If we make the years run from 18 to 32, we have 10,000,000 men; if from 18 to 23, we have 5,000,000 men; and about 1,000,000 young men reach military age every year. Give these men a chance, a fighting chance, and I make bold to predict that America shall never have a war.

"'But,' some one objects, 'this is advocating militarism with a vengeance. That means training a nation of soldiers.' It does mean a nation with sons ready to defend it; but it does not mean militarism. Let us listen to the words of our President, when he defines the difference between militarism and preparedness:

"'I should say it was not inconsistent with the traditions of the country that the people should know how to take care of themselves; but it is inconsistent with the traditions of the country that their knowledge of arms should be used by a governmental organization which would make and organize a great army subject to orders to do what a particular set of men might at the time think it was best to have it do. That is the militarism of Europe, where a few persons can determine what an armed nation is to do. That is what I understand militarism to be.

NOT MILITARISM.

"'But a nation acquainted with arms is not a militaristic nation unless there is somebody who can by an order determine what they shall all do with that force. I think we ought to be very careful not to let these different things seem as if they were the same.'

"Let us stand, every man, in favor of the resolution to be submitted to us to-night asking for universal military service.

"The second resolution calls for a conference of nations after the war with a view to coming to international agreement regarding lasting and, if possible, perpetual peace.

"Let this Republic be the first to take steps to bring peace and happiness to a war-worn world. The heart of humanity cries out for peace. I believe that the very men in the trenches long for it. The saddened wives and mothers, the little ones, lonely and fatherless, crave it. Must nations continue to block the wheels of the world's progress by rivers of blood? Must a very hell be let loose at intervals to deluge men and women in hate? To set nations back centuries? To wipe out the fruits of ages of toil? To destroy the world's manhood?

"I believe that this great Republic, resting solid on the rights of men, has a golden opportunity after the present war. Let us bring pressure to bear on the nations that will be found resting after this conflict, tired, depleted, worn out, in order that they may come together in a great world conference to discuss lasting peace. Let us endeavor to find some way of settling international disputes without sword, fire, poisonous gas, and human sacrifice.

"I ask you, lovers of America, to-night to stand for the real preparedness that will mean real peace."

AMERICA A UNITED COUNTRY.

Former Secretary of the Navy Hilary A. Herbert, who served in the Cabinet of the late President Cleveland, made a short speech. He said that he was a Confederate veteran, and knew what war meant. The former Secretary declared that Germany was now at war with this country, and that this was no time for temporizing. He declared that when the imperial chancellor declared that Germany had done nothing to cause war with America that the voice of W. J. Bryan was heard in the land declaring that America would not go to war.

The veteran declared that on June 6 the Confederate veterans would parade down historic Pennsylvania Avenue in the Nation's capital, cheered by the thousands of veterans of the Grand Army of the Republic, and that this would show the world that America would face the foe with a united front and would be victor in the end.

TOOMER URGED PREPARATION.

W. M. Toomer urged the country to prepare for eventualities. He said that this country should stand ready to protect its honor and its citizens at all times, and that with proper training the manhood of the Nation would be found ready and able for the task.

Rev. J. B. French was the last speaker before the introduction of the resolutions. He painted the horrible picture of war, and deplored the fact that the civilized nations found it necessary at this late date to appeal to arms to settle their difficulties. However, he declared that if war was made upon this country the people should answer the call to the colors and defend the country against the attacks of the alien enemy.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED.

Every speaker of the evening was frequently interrupted by vociferous applause. When Maj. St. Clair-Abrams was explaining the resolutions he introduced, calling upon Congress to pass a bill for compulsory universal military training, he brought the audience to its feet with his eloquence. He declared that after reading the resolutions adopted in South Carolina, Virginia, and other States he felt that the resolution he had drawn was too tame, but inasmuch as he had not had time to draft another he would read it as he had written it. The resolution, which was unanimously adopted, reads as follows:

"Whereas the existing situation demands complete preparedness by the United States to meet present and future aggression by the central powers of Europe on the people and rights of this Republic; and

"Whereas the sinking of American vessels without warning, with the resulting loss of American lives, constitutes acts of war levied against the United States to which there can be but one response compatible with the honor, dignity, and glory of the Republic; Be it therefore

"Resolved, That the people of Florida heartily approve and indorse the breaking off of diplomatic relations with the German Empire and pledge themselves to sustain and support the President of the United States and Congress in their every act looking to the vindication of this Republic and to the maintenance of its rights; be it further

"Resolved, That the people of Florida heartily and enthusiastically advocate compulsory military service, and urge the Congress of the United States to immediately pass what is known as the Chamberlain bill for universal military training, so that this country may be prepared for any eventuality that may arise; be it further

"Resolved, That this meeting considers it the duty of Congress, immediately on its assembling and organizing, to declare that a state of war exists between the United States and the German Empire, and to adopt such measures as will enable this Republic to sustain and maintain itself against any possible attack coming from any quarter; be it further

"Resolved, That we deprecate and denounce any and all efforts looking to further submission to the illegal acts of the German Imperial Government, and declare it our conviction that but one course is now possible, consistent with the courage, honor, and prestige of the Republic, namely, to accept the gage of battle thrown down before us and forcibly resist all aggression until we have secured a victorious peace."

WORLD PEACE DESIRED.

A resolution by Frank Wideman calling upon the nations to provide for world peace after the present war was unanimously adopted as follows:

"Whereas the President of the United States has stated that this Nation is ready after this war to join with other nations in forming a league of nations, the purpose of which shall be restraining as far as may be possible such wars in the future; and

"Whereas the period of our political isolation is past, and while we shall never enter the tangled maze of so-called European diplomacy, and have no desire to form any alliance for the ordinary purposes of such arrangements, it is obvious that we have reached the period when, whether we would have it so or not, we have a direct interest in every considerable difference between nations large and small, and can not, by pleading a desire to be let alone, escape the effects of war waged anywhere on this globe; and

"Whereas the President's recent declaration is a prophecy of the Monroe doctrine written large—applied by all the powers to all the peoples of the earth; and

"Whereas the existing program of civilization has obviously reached the limits of its usefulness and a peace after the war which does not include fundamental changes in international relations will not be permanent; and

"Whereas our own Government may well be taken as a model which the nations should study in forming an association of nations, being itself the product of the voluntary act of the people in 13 sovereign States: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we publicly express our confidence in and applaud the President for his prophetic utterance; we approve his desire for a better understanding between the nations after this war, and we will support any movement loooking toward a discussion of the formation of an association of nations to insure permanent peace after the present war is ended; that at that time we favor the establishment, under proper guaranties and with adequate sanctions, of an association of the civilized nations to secure the submission of all questions and controversies arising between them in the future to suitable tribunals prior to a resort to arms, and we believe that the extension of the principles of the Monroe doctrine to the whole world, as suggested by the President of the United States in his address to the Senate on January 22, will be to the great advantage not only of the American Continent but of all nations; and be it further

"Resolved, That in the present crisis we declare our unqualified approval of the President's program in dealing with Germany; that we do not countenance the compromise of a single inch in dealing with those who destroy American lives and property without warrant of concience or of law; that we are American citizens, and if the Congress about to assemble decides that the hour has struck to vindicate by force of arms the traditions of America and Americans we will back up that decision with our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor."

The resolution presented by Ernest Metcalf was unanimously adopted. It reads as follows:

"Whereas we believe in the long-established and well-defended American doctrine of the freedom of the seas, which means the free and unrestricted passage of the vessels of all nations between the ports of all countries; and

"Whereas we believe that all blockades to be effective should be maintained according to the well-established principles of international law as such principles have been laid down and agreed to by the civilized nations of the earth in The Hague conferences and other conventions of the powers; and

"Whereas we recognize the right of nations at war to seek out and capture or destroy the supplies of their enemies, but do not approve of their so doing without first giving the crews and passengers of vessels of commerce ample opportunity to find places of safety, especially in the case of women and children; and

"Whereas we condemn in the strongest terms the destruction of property within the confines of the borders of neutral States by the agents, spies, or hirelings of a belligerent nation: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the people of Jacksonville, in mass meeting assembled, heartily indorse the steps taken by the President of the United States for the purpose of preventing such destruction of life and property by the arming of American merchant vessels and otherwise; and be it further

"Resolved, That we pledge our unqualified support to the President and Government of the United States for the upholding of the ancient traditions of the Republic and the honor of the country, and to this end, in the language of our forefathers, 'we pledge our lives, our property, and our sacred honor.'"

Mr. FLETCHER. I also present a petition of sundry citizens of St. Augustine and a telegram from the legislative committee of Painters' Local Union No. 164, of Jacksonville, Fla., relating to compulsory military training, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petition and telegram were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ST. AUGUSTINE, FLA., March 30, 1917.

Hon. D. U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned citizens of St. Augustine, do hereby urge you to do everything possible to secure the prompt passage of a bill adequately providing for universal compulsory military training and service.

We believe that this is the quickest and most effective way of providing an army for the defense of the country, and that it will be of the utmost service to our youth in promoting their physical and moral welfare and instilling into them the true spirit of patriotism and respect for and obedience to the law.

J. D. BUSH
(And others).

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., April 2, 1917.

Hon. D. U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We most earnestly request of you to work for the defeat of the Chamberlain bill entitled "Universal military training," Calendar No. 924. Actual count of people attending mass meeting held in armory March 31 was 342 men, 127 women, fully one-half not voting on resolution.

LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE PAINTERS' LOCAL UNION NO. 164,
L. C. MICHELI, Secretary.

Mr. HARDWICK. I present a telegram embodying resolutions adopted at a called meeting of Augusta Lodge, No. 205, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD without reading and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AUGUSTA, GA., April 1, 1917.

THOMAS W. HARDWICK,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

At a called meeting of Augusta Lodge, No. 205, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, to-night the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks is a patriotic American organization, and it is proper and desirable that the President and Congress should be assured of the attitude of the whole people of the United States in the present international crisis: Therefore be it

"Resolved—

"First. That the Augusta Lodge, No. 205, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, in formal meeting assembled, strongly indorses the steps taken by the President to preserve the national honor and protect the lives and property of American citizens from unlawful attack, while it holds up his hands in whatever further action he deems wise and needful.

"Second. That the gathering of Elks understands that a state of war now exists between the United States and Germany, and Congress will have our hearty approval in immediately providing the President with whatever means he desires for the vigorous prosecution of war.

"Third. That equal rights and interests entail equal duties and responsibilities upon every American citizen, and accordingly Congress will meet the wishes of this body by immediately putting into effect universal service and by providing for universal military training as a permanent policy of this Government.

"Fourth. That copies of these resolutions under the seal of the lodge be sent to the President of the United States, each of the United States Senators from Georgia, and the Congressman from the tenth district of Georgia in the United States House of Representatives, as well as to the Congressmen from the first district of Georgia and the second district of South Carolina, inasmuch as a large portion of their respective constituencies reside within the fraternal jurisdiction of this lodge, which has many members in both of these districts."

J. FRANK CARSWELL,
Exalted Ruler.
J. S. FARR, Secretary.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I present a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of New Hampshire in favor of universal military and naval training. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The concurrent resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have a telegram from the president of Dartmouth College, signed by himself and 47 other members of the Dartmouth faculty. The president of Dartmouth College states that they are now on a vacation and only about one-half the faculty have signed the telegram. He expresses the opinion that had the entire faculty been present it would have been practically a unanimous matter.

This telegram declares that in the judgment of the president and faculty of Dartmouth College we are in a state of war, and asks me to sustain the President in any endeavor that he may make to protect the honor and integrity of our Nation. I respond heartily to that request. I ask that the telegram be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HANOVER, N. H., March 31, 1917.

Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

The following resolution has been signed, besides myself, by President Emeritus Tucker and 47 other members of the Dartmouth faculty. As Dartmouth is now on vacation only about half the faculty could be reached. I believe in term time the number of signatures would be nearly doubled.

"Resolved, That the undersigned members of the faculty of Dartmouth College record our emphatic conviction that a state of war exists by repeated acts of Germany, and that our national duty to humanity and civilization demand that a declaration to this effect be made at once, to be followed by immediate and wholehearted support of the allied cause on both sea and land."

ERNEST M. HOPKINS,
President Dartmouth College.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have also, Mr. President, a telegram from a committee of one hundred on public safety appointed by Gov. Keyes, of New Hampshire. That great organization met and passed a resolution along the same line, which I submit and ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONCORD, N. H., March 30, 1917.

Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The committee of one hundred on public safety appointed by Gov. Keyes, met to-day and organized as follows: Executive committee, chairman, John B. Jameson, Antrim; vice chairman, Rolland H. Spalding, Rochester; secretary, Robert Jackson, Concord; treasurer, H. H. Dudley, Concord; Frank S. Streeter, Concord; Arthur M. Heard, Manchester; A. B. Jenks, Manchester; Winthrop L. Carter, Nashua; Harlow S. Person, Hanover; Clarence E. Carr, Andover; Roy D. Hunter, Clarement; and the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas a state of war now exists between the United States and Germany; and

"Whereas this condition has been forced upon us in spite of our utmost endeavors to avoid it by all honorable means; and

"Whereas in the prosecution of this war, and while professing friendship for us, the Government of Germany has ignored its treaties, repeatedly broken its pledges, instigated and encouraged sedition in our land, murdered our citizen upon the high seas, and conspired to bring conflict between us and nations with which we are now at peace: Be it

"Resolved by the New Hampshire committee, That we recognize that a state of war exists and urge immediate action in maintaining our honor and safeguarding our interests and pledging to our Government our full loyalty and support.

"Second. That we urge upon our Congress soon to assemble the imperative necessity for the immediate enactment of such legislation as shall make it possible to preserve our rights as a nation in any contingency.

"Third, That we also urge upon Congress the necessity of retaining in positions of national trust and responsibility only those men known to be loyal, that precedents in either committee chairmanships or otherwise, and that all partisanship be submerged in patriotic appreciation of the needs of the hour.

"Fourth. That we urge upon the people of our State a serious realization of conditions that confront us and quick action in preparing for the most effective maintenance of our rights and honor.

"Fifth. That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the President of the United States, to the President of the Senate, and Speaker of the National House of Representatives, and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from New Hampshire."

JOHN B. JAMESON,
Chairman Executive Committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. I present also a telegram from the Concord Branch of the National Security League, asking me to support the President in any effort that he may make under the laws and Constitution of the Government to protect the honor of our country. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONCORD, N. H., March 30, 1917.

Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER,

The following telegram has this night been sent to the President of the United States:

"The Concord (N. H.) Branch of the National Security League, resenting the un-American propaganda circulated by the Emergency Peace Federation and believing that the present crisis calls for aggressive action, hereby pledges its support in any steps you may take to defend the national honor."

CONCORD (N. H.) BRANCH NATIONAL SECURITY LEAGUE.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have also, Mr. President, a telegram from a committee in the city of Portsmouth, N. H., signed by the mayor and various other leading citizens, covering the same ground. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PORTSMOUTH, N. H., March 31, 1917.

Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

It becomes my duty, as chairman of the preparedness day committee, to express the will and wish of the people of the city of Portsmouth, as expressed by them on Thursday, the 29th day of March, a day set aside by proclamation of the mayor of the city of Portsmouth, Samuel T. Ladd. This proclamation met with such hearty patriotic response and force that it was deemed wise that the unbounded patriotism displayed by our people be expressed to you that you take action to uphold and support the dignity of our country and flag on the 2d day of April, when Congress convenes, and that you may be assured of their hearty support in your effort to uphold the honor of our country.

LUKE ASHWORTH,
Chairman of the Preparedness Day Committee.
SAMUEL T. LADD,
Mayor of the City of Portsmouth.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask to have printed in the RECORD two letters from members of the faculty of Dartmouth College, who were not permitted to sign the telegram which I have submitted.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF POLITICAL SCIENCE,
DARTMOUTH COLLEGE,
Hanover, N. H., March 30, 1917.

Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As a citizen of this town and one of your constituents, I venture to express to you at this critical period in our national life my opinion, which has been deliberately formed, especially as it now appears to be shared by nearly all of your constituents whom I have recently met, that Congress immediately upon it assembling ought to declare war against the German Empire, or declare that a state of war already exists between the United States and that Empire, and that it ought then to proceed to empower the President to use our land and naval forces to carry on such war with the utmost vigor.

The willful, persistent, and cumulating violations of the rights of our citizens upon the high seas by Germany, her discovered plots to disturb our internal peace and provoke invasion of our territory, and her outrageous infractions of solemn treaties and many international usages, which heretofore have bound the family of nations, in my judgment, now leave the United States no possible alternative remedy except the ultimate remedy of war if we are to preserve those rights and perpetuate our national independence and honor.

If any additional reason for our entrance into the war be judged necessary, it exists in the menace which a triumphant Germany at the end of the present European struggle would constitute to civil liberty and republican institutions, even on this side of the Atlantic.

Adequate preparation for present war, as well as insurance for the stability of our republican form of government, seems to me to require the immediate adoption by Congress of a national system of universal compulsory military and naval training and service. What concerns all to preserve, as well as to enjoy—free institutions—ought to have the support of all.

Hoping that your way may be plain in the discharge of the solemn duty that now devolves upon you as a Member of Congress, I am

Respectfully, yours,

JAMES F. COLBY.

DARTMOUTH COLLEGE,
Hanover, N. H., March 29, 1917.

MY DEAR SENATOR GALLINGER: The recent attitude of the president of Dartmouth, and the recent vote of its faculty providing for military training (passed unanimously), and the vote for giving credit toward a degree for time given to the service of the United States by students as volunteers represents, I believe, the attitude of your fellow citizens in Hanover in favor of entering into war with Germany, based upon prompt declaration of war by Congress.

Much as I have loved peace and hated the inevitable barbarity of war, I am convinced that a just peace and the honor of our country and the rights of mankind and the preservation of democracy can, in face of the German record, be secured only by a vigorous war pursued with all our resources. I believe you will be in accord with that view, and I trust your long experience will tell to that end in congressional action.

I am, very respectfully, yours,

HERBERT D. FOSTER,
Professor and Head of Department of History.

Mr. GALLINGER. I also submit a letter from the Men's Club of Durham, N. H., asking that the President shall be supported in all steps necessary to uphold the honor and integrity of our country. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE MEN'S CLUB OF DURHAM,
Durham, N. H., March 31, 1917.

Hon. JABOB H. GALLINGER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: The Men's Club of Durham, N. H., with 110 members present, unanimously voted its willingness and desire to stand back of President Wilson and the National and State Government in all steps it becomes necessary to take to uphold the honor and integrity of our country in this time of our national crisis. This action receives added strength when it is remembered that Durham is a town of less than 900 inhabitants and is the seat of New Hampshire College of Agriculture and the Mechanic Arts. Students in college were not included in the above, but all other classes of the community were fairly and fully represented.

The Men's Club wishes to learn how it can be of the greatest service at this time and awaits direction in the matter.

Respectfully, yours,

C. J. HAM, Secretary-Treasurer.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it is proper that I should say that I am also in receipt of a considerable number of letters from citizens of New Hampshire, protesting against war; but manifestly the predominant and overwhelming sentiment of the people of the State demands that the aggressions of the German Government shall be resisted at all hazards.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have received copies of the same telegrams which my colleague [Mr. GRONNA] has presented. I also have one from the governor of the State of North Dakota, and another from the Lutheran Young People's Society of Great Bend, N. Dak., which I ask to have read.

There being no objection, the telegrams were read, as follows:

FARGO, N. DAK., March 31, 1917.

Hon. P. J. MCCUMBER,
Washington, D. C.:

The people of North Dakota are patriotic and loyal to the National Government, yet they favor armed neutrality rather than war, and pray that all honorable means may be used to avoid further trouble.

LYNN J. FRAZIER, Governor.

GREAT BEND, N. DAK., March 31, 1917.

Senator P. J. MCCUMBER,
Washington, D. C.:

In meeting assembled we unanimously expressed the opinion that there is no sufficient cause for war, and we therefore earnestly appeal to you to do your utmost to preserve peace. We also protest that our Government give any of the belligerents financial or any other aid.

LUTHERAN YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETY.

Mr. COLT. I present a telegram, signed by the governor of Rhode Island, and other State officers, which I desire to have read. I ask that the signatures be omitted in the reading, but that they be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was read, as follows:

PROVIDENCE, R. I., April 2, 1917.

Senator LEBARON B. COLT,
Washington, D. C.:

The undersigned citizens of Rhode Island, representing the overwhelming conviction of men and women of this State, believe that the wanton and brutal attacks upon the rights and liberties of the United States constitute an undeniable state of war. We therefore urge upon the President, the Senate, and the House of Representatives the duty and immediate necessity of waging aggressive war in defense of the safety and honor of the American Nation and in whole-hearted support of liberty and democracy throughout the world.

R. Livingston Beekman, governor of Rhode Island; Charles Dean Kimball, ex-governor of Rhode Island; James H. Higgins, ex-governor of Rhode Island; James De Wolf Perry, Jess H. Metcalf, G. A. Roelker, George C. Hinckley, Thos. H. West, jr., Harold Congdon, T. F. I. McDonnell, Howard Knight, Charles F. Stearss, Walter Hidden, Robert W. Taft.

Mr. LODGE. I present telegrams and resolutions from citizens of Massachusetts and also from sundry organizations in my State, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the telegrams and resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK.

Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE,
Washington, D. C.:

Representing Groton School, wish to assure you of support of masters, boys, and graduates in your effort to place this Nation on footing of cooperation with allies in determination to establish freedom and justice in the world. Please wire, collect to Groton, informing me if we can do anything to help now.

SOMERSET CLUB,
Boston, Mass., March 30, 1917.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
Washington, D. C.:

At a meeting of the Somerset Club of Boston, held March 30, 1917, it was unanimously—

Resolved, That we, members of the Somerset Club of Boston, mindful of the consequences of our action, but conscious of the duty of every lover of his country, and believing that the principles of humanity demand instant and vigorous action, do hereby pledge to the President of the United States our loyal support in all measures which he shall take in the defense of our country's honor and the protection of the rights of its citizens; and believing that a democracy which asserts the right of manhood suffrage should insist upon the corresponding duty of manhood service, we earnestly urge upon the President and Congress the immediate enactment of laws providing for obligatory national military service; and believing that American principles and traditions admit of nothing less, we express the confident expectation that this Nation will, with all its resources, make common cause with the entente allies in the defense of human liberty and the ideal of modern civilization.

It was further unanimously voted that a copy of the foregoing be sent to the President of the United States, the members of the Cabinet, and the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Massachusetts.

BOSTON, MASS., March 26, 1917.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Resolved, That we, the citizens of Weston, Mass., assembled in our annual town meeting, at this time of grave national crisis declare our allegiance to our country and our unhesitating support of the President of the United States and all other constituted authorities in any forward step to protect American lives, American rights, and American honor. No ship that flies our flag is too small, no American life is too humble to be denied the protection of our Government. We urge upon Congress the imperative duty of enacting at the coming session a bill for compulsory military training of the youth of our land as a safeguard of liberty. Our country needs and demands leadership; and we call upon our President and the Congress, and upon our governor, to take immediate and effective action to resist aggression, that unashamed we may transmit to our descendants those principles of freedom and duty for which our ancestors were proud to shed their blood.

Unanimously adopted by rising vote.

UNION CLUB OF BOSTON.

At a special meeting held at Boston in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts on Saturday, March 24, 1917, the club unanimously adopted the following resolutions:

"Whereas Germany's declaration of war and her violation of Belgium were a declaration of war against civilization and a violation of the rights of all mankind; and

"Whereas her conduct of the war, her barbarous treatment of civilians in the countries she overran, and her efforts to terrify her enemies by bombarding peaceful villages and by killing women and children soon made it manifest that she would not scruple to violate the rights of neutrals whenever she might hope to gain military advantage thereby; and

"Whereas the plots, conspiracies, and perfidy of her diplomatic agents, her destruction of American lives and American property, and finally her illegal and brutal use of the submarine have led to a severance of diplomatic relations between her and the United States; and

"Whereas now, after this menace of war has been hanging over us for two years and a half, we are as unprepared to assert the rights of our citizens or to defend ourselves against invasion as we were when the war began; and

"Whereas our duty and our honor as well as our interest demand that we should make strenuous efforts to atone for the blindness and apathy which we have exhibited hitherto, and should repair so far as possible the manifold omissions of which we have been guilty; and

"Whereas this club was founded in the days of the Civil War for 'the encouragement and dissemination of patriotic sentiment and opinion,' and the spirit which animated its founders has not wholly ceased to glow in the breasts of its members: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we heartily approve and commend the action taken by President Wilson in severing diplomatic relations with Germany; that if our merchant vessels are being armed by the Government to defend themselves against the German submarines, we heartily approve and commend the President's action in that respect; that we deplore the fact that our people have been content to do nothing in the way of preparation when, in the period which has elapsed since the war began, an army and navy adequate for the protection of the country and the enforcement of her rights might have been organized, drilled, and equipped; that we respectfully urge the President and the Congress to recognize the present emergency and to take resolute and energetic measures to meet the same; that we particularly urge upon them the necessity for universal military training and service as the only democratic and the only effective method of obtaining a sufficient military force; that we pledge to the Government true allegiance and our hearty support in all measures it may take to regain for our country such a position among nations as its population, wealth, and territory entitle it to occupy and such a position as its duty, traditions, and fair fame demand that it shall assume; that, in our opinion, we can neither be true to ourselves nor escape being false to those who are pouring out their blood and treasure in a cause which is now beyond doubt or cavil our cause as well as theirs, unless war against Germany be declared forthwith; and that in prosecuting the war the Government of the United States ought to cooperate in every practicable way with the Governments of the entente powers in order to bring about the defeat of Germany; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of the foregoing resolutions be sent by the Secretary to President Wilson and to all Members of the Congress of the United States."

HARVARD CLUB OF BOSTON,
374 Commonwealth Avenue, March 27, 1917.

DEAR SIR: At the annual meeting, held March 21, 1917, of the Harvard Club of Boston, Mass., an organization of 4,500 members, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted.

Respectfully, yours,

P. W. THOMSON, Secretary.

Resolved, That the recent severance of diplomatic relations with the German Empire by the Government of the United States of America was fully justified by the events which preceded and have succeeded it.

That the United States of America, in fidelity to their traditions and the principles of human freedom which they represent, of right and in duty ought to be from now henceforward in active and loyal cooperation with the nations leagued against the common enemy, and that the military, naval, industrial, and financial resources of the people of the United States of America should be promptly and vigorously organized, mobilized, and used to that end.

That the Harvard Club of Boston pledges its steadfast and loyal support to the President of the United States of America in his leadership of the people to assert their rights on land and sea and to uphold national honor and international justice.

Further resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, to the members of his Cabinet, to the Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States, to the secretary of the Associated Harvard Clubs, and to the secretaries of all the Harvard clubs in the world.

WELLESLEY, MASS., March 24, 1917.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D C.

MY DEAR SENATOR LODGE: I am inclosing a resolution which is signed by 88 members of the faculty of Wellesley College. Although I personally have signed the resolution and am heartily in favor of it, it should be clearly understood that it is not the corporate action of the faculty, but is a resolution signed by 88 people who happen to be members of our official staff.

I am, most truly, yours,

ELLEN F. PENDLETON.

Suggested draft of resolution suitable for adoption by civic, religious, commercial, and other organizations.

We the undersigned members of the faculty of Wellesley College adopt the following minute:

After exhausting the resources of diplomacy in an effort to avert war, the President has now taken the only course consistent with national self-respect.

War with Germany will not ensue unless the Imperial German Government knowingly violates well settled principles of international law and violates them with intent definitely hostile to the United States. In that event war will inevitably follow, not by our own act, but through the deliberate aggression of another nation.

If any honest doubt exists respecting the cause of war in Europe, the awful responsibility for extending it to this hemisphere will rest upon Germany, and upon Germany alone.

It may be that the Imperial German Government is misinformed respecting the temper of the people of the United States, just as that Government is supposed to have misconceived the sentiment of the British Empire at the outbreak of the European war. If so, and before fatal action based upon so grave a mistake is taken, Germany should be made aware of the essential unity of our people and of their loyal determination to make all sacrifices necessary to protect our liberty and to maintain our honor. To this end we call upon all bodies similar to ours throughout the country and upon all groups of citizens organized for whatever purpose, to meet without delay and express themselves with no uncertain voice respecting the course that they will be prepared to follow.

We urge all such groups of citizens, secular and religious, large and small, societies, clubs, and institutions of every sort, to unite with us in giving immediate public expression to such convictions as those which we now solemnly record:

First. That the act of the Executive in severing diplomatic relations with Germany is one to be approved and commended by all who have the best interests of the United States at heart.

Second. That the German declaration of January 31, 1917, represents an unjustified and unjustifiable attempt to destroy the freedom of the sea and to abridge the commercial liberty guaranteed to us by established law and custom; and that if the Government of the United States were to acquiesce therein such action would be resented by all good citizens as in the highest degree pusillanimous and as altogether inconsistent with the spirit and traditions of a free people.

Third. That the President will be justified in recommending to Congress the most extreme measures that may be deemed necessary to protect life, liberty, and property; and that it is our duty and that of all loyal citizens to tender immediately to the Government all the service of which we severally and collectively are capable.

Fourth. That while all should stand ready to volunteer if voluntary service is called for, yet Congress, in providing for our common safety, should not adopt emergency measures merely, but should definitely recognize the principle that the duty of defending the Nation rests equally upon all citizens capable of service. To the end, therefore, that the burden of safeguarding the country should no longer be cast exclusively upon the loyal National Guard and upon other patriotic military and naval volunteers, Congress should be urged to exercise its constitutional power "to raise and support armies" by establishing immediately a permanent and democratic system of defense based upon universal service and training under direct and exclusive Federal control.

A copy of this minute is ordered to be transmitted to the President of the United States, to the Secretary of War and other members of the Cabinet, and to the Members of both congressional Committees on Military Affairs.

[The Commonwealth of Massachusetts, town of Wakefield, annual town meeting, Mar. 19, 1917.]

Resolutions.

In a time of stress it is the duty of every citizen to subordinate his personal interest and ambition to the welfare of the Nation and to lift politics to the level of statesmanship: Therefore

Resolved, That we, the voters of the town of Wakefield, in annual town meeting assembled, desire to place on the records of the town our appreciation of the patriotic manner in which the Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE and the Hon JOHN W. WEEKS, Senators to the Congress from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and to the Hon. FREDERICK W. DALLINGER, Representative to the Congress from the eighth congressional district, have discharged their duties and have supported the President of the United States in the performance of the onerous and painful tasks which have been thrust upon him by the outrageous and inhuman acts of the German Empire, with whom we have hitherto been at peace and between whom and its enemies the Unites States has maintained the strictest neutrality in accordance with the well-established principles of international law. To their great learning, experience, courage, and devotion the whole Nation is deeply indebted.

Resolved, That these resolutions be spread upon the records of the town and that a copy hereof, certified by the clerk under the seal of the town, be forwarded to Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE, to Hon. JOHN W. WEEKS, and to Hon FREDERICK W. DALLINGER.

SAMUEL K. HAMILTON,
HARRIS M. DOLBEARE,
MICHAEL LOW,
MAYNARD E. S. CLEMONS,
EDEN K. BOWSER,

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of resolutions unanimously adopted at a town meeting of the town of Wakefield held March 19, 1917.

Attest:
[SEAL.] FREDERICK HARTSHORNE,

Mr. WEEKS. I present resolutions from citizens and organizations in the State of Massachusetts. I do not wish to have them read, but I should like to have them incorporated in the RECORD unless they are duplicates of those which have just been offered by my colleague [Mr. LODGE].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolutions referred to are as follows:

Resolutions adopted by the New England Leather and Shoe Finders' Association at its annual convention held at the Quincy House, Boston, Mass., March 8, 1917.

Whereas the very life of our country is endangered by the international crisis with which it is confronted, our commerce is injured, and our rights upon the high seas ignored; and

Whereas our country is menaced by the unfriendly acts and intrigues of a hitherto friendly nation: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the New England Leather and Shoe Finders' Association, in convention assembled, hereby heartily indorse the action of the President in this crisis and pledge to him its loyal support.

It earnestly commends those Senators and Congressmen who supported the President in his efforts to secure protective legislation, but it condemns in unmeasured terms the outrageous, un-American, and unpatriotic action of those 12 Senators who endeavored to prevent legislation so vital to the protection of our land: And be it further

Resolved, That our association pledge its hearty cooperation to the governors and legislatures of each of our New England States and to the Massachusetts committee on public safety, and will earnestly support and assist them as far as able in any measure which they deem necessary and advisable to take for the preservation of our liberty and rights, for the safeguarding of our flag and country, and for the protection of our people and the Republic.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the President, to the New England Senators and Congressmen at Washington, to each of the New England governors, and to the chairman of the Massachusetts committee on public safety.

Hon. JOHN W. WEEKS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: By action of the convention of the Massachusetts State Council United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, held in Worcester, Mass., February 19–22, 1917, I am directed to send you a copy of the following resolution, which was adopted by that body:

"Whereas the present living conditions have reached a point where it is impossible for the wage earners of this country to live except under conditions that amount to almost starvation; and

"Whereas these conditions are brought about by the sordid and selfish interests of unscrupulous speculators in foodstuffs and other necessities of life; and

"Whereas we believe that the power of President Wilson and Congress should be used to conserve humane living conditions for the people of this country: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That this convention assembled demand that President Wilson and Congress enforce such laws as will protect the people and prevent the continuation of unscrupulous food speculators from further starving the working men and women of this country. Be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be printed in the proceedings of this convention, a copy at once to be sent to President Wilson, Congress, and Attorney General; also one to each of the Congressmen and Senators from this State; also given to the press."

Very truly,

CARPENTERS' DISTRICT COUNCIL,
Newton, Mass., March 12, 1917.

Hon. JOHN W. WEEKS,
Senator from Massachusetts, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At a meeting of this council held March 8 the following resolutions were adopted, and I was instructed to forward a copy of the same to you.

Respectfully, yours, EVERETT A. MCASSEY, Secretary.
NEWTON, MASS., March 8, 1917.

Whereas the present prices of food have soared beyond the reach of the workingmen of this country; and

Whereas the manipulators of the foodstuffs in this country seem to have cornered the market so that there is no relief in sight; and

Whereas the citizens of this country deem it time that some drastic action be taken to stop this procedure at once: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this Carpenters' District Council of Newton, Mass., demand that you, as a representative of the people of the United States, put in force such laws that this state of affairs will stop at once, now, and for all time; and also be it

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, one to the governor of Massachusetts, one to the mayor of our city, one to the Attorney General of the United States, one to each of our 2 Senators, and one to each of our 16 Representatives in Congress, and also be spread on the records of this meeting.

ALEX. G. NICOLSON,
GEORGE SOBIESKI,
E. MURPHY,
Committee on Resolutions.

LANESVILLE, MASS., March 28, 1917.

Hon. JOHN W. WEEKS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: At a mass meeting of about 200 persons, held at 1097 Washington Street, Lanesville, Mass., on March 24, 1917, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"We, citizens of Lanesville, members of the Socialist Party of Massachusetts and citizens of the United States, who support the Socialist Party in its demand for peace, do hereby register our opposition against every effort to thrust this country into war. We demand that our Representatives in Congress oppose the declaration of war against any nation."

JOHN PELTA, Chairman.
JOHN HEINANEN, Secretary.

Resolution adopted unanimously by an audience of 1,500 citizens, Sunday, March 25, 1917, at Brockton, Mass.

Whereas we believe that the evidence is overwhelming that the traffickers in foodstuffs and munitions with Europe, professional militarists at home, and great financial interests are active in trying to involve this country in war:

Resolved, That we do not believe that the sinking of foodstuffs en route or the destruction of munitions in transit to Europe constitute any reason for spending the lives of American citizens by plunging into war; that we urge all citizens to join in protest against the sinister exploiting interests that seek to lead us to the shambles: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, citizens assembled in Clark Hall, Brockton, Mass., on Sunday, March 25, 1917, do solemnly call upon our President and upon Congress to use every means in their power to preserve peace; and be it further

Resolved, That the chairman of this meeting forward to our President, our Senators, and Members of Congress a copy of this resolution.

Hon. JOHN WINGATE WEEKS,
West Newton, Mass.

DEAR SIR: I, Preston B. Churchill, town clerk of the town of Winthrop, hereby certify that the following is a true copy from the records of the town of Winthrop of resolutions passed by an unanimous vote of said town at the annual meeting held March 12, 1917:

Resolutions.

As the descendants of those patriots who, in the early days of the Republic, sent out armed ships to defend American rights on the high seas, and as the freemen of one of the governmental divisions of the 100,000,000 people of the United States, whose prosperity and hopes for the future were purchased by the blood of those whose names are enrolled on the soldiers' monuments erected in every hamlet of our free land, it is hereby

Resolved, That we, the citizens of the town of Winthrop, Mass., in town meeting assembled, indorse the action of the President of the United States in severing diplomatic relations with the Imperial German Government.

Resolved, That we pledge our fidelity, our confidence, and our constant, devoted, and unwavering loyalty and support to the President in his purpose to protect and defend American rights, American lives, and American honor on the high seas.

Resolved, That the town clerk be and is hereby directed to spread a copy of these resolutions upon the records, and to send a copy thereof to the President of the United States, and to each Senator and Congressman from Massachusetts.

A true copy. Attest.
[SEAL.] PRESTON B. CHURCHILL, Town Clerk.

FALL RIVER CENTRAL LABOR UNION,
FALL RIVER, MASS., March 4, 1917.

Whereas the Imperial German Government, by proclaiming a barred zone about the coasts of the British Isles, France, and the coasts of Europe and Africa bordering on the Mediterranean Sea, into which all vessels enter at peril of destruction, contrary to all recognized international rights; and

Whereas American ships have been destroyed and are now imperiled by the activities of submarine commanders under direction of the Imperial German Government, without right and without justification; and

Whereas the lives of American citizens have been sacrificed by the acts of the commanders of submarines acting under instructions of the Imperial German Government, which disclaims liability or blame, contrary to all law and morality: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Central Labor Union of Fall River, Mass., representing the body of organized labor in the city, does here and now pledge its support to the President of the United States in the measures that are made necessary by the aggressions of the Imperial German Government; and be it further

Resolved, That the extent of this support be not limited to the simple arming of merchant vessels and their convoyance by ships of war, but shall extend to the use of other instrumentalities that may be demanded by the exigencies of the situation; and be it further

Resolved, That the said Central Labor Union do hereby call upon Senator WEEKS and Senator LODGE and Congressman WILLIAM S. GREENE to support the President of the United States to the extent of their powers in maintaining the sovereign right of freedom to traverse the oceans without let or hindrance by the shipping of the United States of America.

To this end, therefore, witness our hands and the seal of the Fall River Central Labor Union this 4th day of March, A. D. 1917.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, the General Assembly of Vermont is now in session. In anticipation of the crisis which is upon us as a Nation that body has already appropriated a million dollars to enable the governor to meet any requisition which the General Government may make on that State for military service. The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the conviction of the Vermont committee of public safety that the present crisis calls for stern, vigorous, and immediate action by the National Government, and that this committee pledges to the President and Congress its zealous and constant support; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of this committee forward a copy of this resolution to the President and each member of the Vermont delegation in Congress.

I have sent the President the following message which represents my views and those of practically all my friends and associates:

"WOODROW WILSON, President, Washington, D. C.:

"With profound respect for you and the dignity of your great office, without prejudice or the influence of any selfish personal interests, and having only at heart the safety and honor of our country, believing that the fundamentals of democracy are at stake, involving the life and ideals of our own Nation, I urge you and Congress to enter the war promptly, on the side of liberty, democracy, and ultimate and early peace, with all the power and vigor we can command. In meeting assembled the following resolutions were adopted by the undersigned:

"Whereas our Government, the United States of America, by means of the persistent activity of some of our citizens who desire to profit by trade in war supplies with belligerent countries, is being drawn into relations threatening war; and

"Whereas on account of said trade our food supply is being diminished and consequent prices are so high that many of our citizens are unable to secure sufficient of the necessaries of life, even to the point of suffering: Therefore we, citizens of the United States of America, offer the following:

"Resolved, First, that we favor all means of keeping our country from war (except in case of actual, unprovoked invasion of our territory), even to the point of declaring an embargo on the shipment of supplies from our country to belligerent countries (which embargo we favor); and

"Resolved, Second, that in order to more efficiently distribute the necessaries of life and reduce the cost of living our Government should take over, own, and operate the railroads at cost of operation, in the interest of the whole people. Be it

"Resolved further, That we approve Senator KIRBY and others' attitude in regard to arming merchant vessels, and that a copy of these resolutions be furnished our Congressman and each of our United States Senators."

W. J. Bryan, for whom I voted three times in as many presidential elections, is to me still the peerless leader of democracy, who still keeps up, undaunted, the fight of the people against the powers of our uncrowned kings of high finance, to whom others have surrendered.

He is our present great commoner, who would rather be right than Secretary of State.

I think that each person ought not to act along the line of least resistance, but according to his conscience.

Hon. JOSEPH T. ROBINSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR AND FRIEND: I am addressing you this letter as a friend and adherent. First I want to compliment you upon your firm stand in upholding the President. Germany has been doing violence to every sense of justice and right, as far as the United States is concerned, and we certainly ought to at once either declare war against her or that a state of war exists; then I hope to see you, as one of our foremost Senators, introduce a resolution into the Senate declaring that inasmuch as Germany has many times most flagrantly violated the so-called old treaties, made over a century ago, that the said treaties have thus been nullified by her action. Our country wants to be entirely free of any treaty obligations with such an inhuman nation, so as to forever close the door upon her, as far as the "most favored nation clause" of treaties is concerned, then the United States would be in a position to take possession of the many German ships in our ports, and thus be enabled to pay indemnities to relatives of our citizens that Germany ruthlessly destroyed when she sank the Lusitania. I certainly hope that you can see your way clear to introduce the resolution to declare those old treaties null and void, because of Germany not holding to them; it is not right for one nation to hold to it when the other violates it so often, as she has done.

With assurances of regard and best wishes, I remain,

Yours, truly,

J. W. GARDNER.

DEAR SIR: The propositions of the administration forces at Washington to protect a part of our commerce that is doing nothing but raising prices and making conditions almost intolerable for a salaried man, to float a loan for a fight in which the average American can not be interested, it does not seem to me could be called peace measures, and peace is what we want, at least most of us.

I would appreciate your voting against any of these things that can not do anything but work harm for the country at large. There is little sentiment for war outside of high circles and the newspapers.

HOKE SMITH,

At a called meeting of Augusta Lodge, No. 205, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, to-night, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks is a patriotic American organization, and it is proper and desirable that the President and Congress should be assured of the attitude of the whole people of the United States in the present international crisis: Therefore be it

"Resolved—

"First, That the Augusta Lodge, No. 205, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, in formal meeting assembled strongly indorses the steps taken by the President to preserve the national honor and protect the lives and property of American citizens from unlawful attack, while it will hold up his hands in whatever further action he deems wise and needful.

"Second. That this gathering of Elks understands that a state of war now exists between the United States and Germany, and Congress will have our hearty approval in immediately providing the President with whatever means he desires for the vigorous prosecution of war.

"Third. That equal rights and interest entail equal duties and responsibilities upon every American citizen, and, accordingly, Congress will meet the wishes of this body by immediately putting into effect universal service and by providing for universal military training as a permanent policy of this Government.

"Fourth. That copies of these resolutions under the seal of the lodge be sent to the President of the United States, each of the United States Senators from Georgia, and the Congressman from the tenth district of Georgia in the United States House of Representatives, as well as to the Congressmen from the first district of Georgia and the second district of South Carolina, inasmuch as a large portion of their respective constituencies reside within the fraternal jurisdiction of this lodge, which has many members in both of these districts."

Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At its annual meeting held in the clubhouse on March 27, 1917, the Union League Club of Chicago stated its stand on the present crisis and the manner of meeting it in the following resolution:

"Whereas with a desire to avoid armed conflict, the Government of the United States has for many months patiently endeavored by diplomatic negotiations to protect its citizens in their lives and property from intolerable attacks by Germany, and to secure trustworthy promise of security for the future, and all such efforts have failed, so that, against its will, this Nation is now on the verge of war; and

"Whereas the time has come when this country must defend its rights and vindicate its honor decisively and by all means necessary to those ends; and

"Whereas the present crisis shows that the United States must be prepared at all times to defend itself, and to protect the rights of its citizens; and

"Whereas, subject only to such conditions as Congress may prescribe, all able-bodied men between 18 and 45 years of age are liable under Federal law to perform military duty in the service of the United States; and

"Whereas a system of universal military training will not only prepare the citizen for service in war but will develop in him a sense of democracy, of discipline, and of responsibility to duty, and will add a dignity to the defensive military service of the country, which is most justly its due: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Union League Club of Chicago places itself on record as supporting the President of the United States in severing of diplomatic relations with Germany and in all efforts made and to be made by him, even to the extent of war, to protect American lives and property and defend our national rights, and calls upon Congress to give to the President the fullest support; and further places itself on record as favoring the principles of universal military service in this emergency and for the future defense of the Nation; and also calls upon Congress to provide by the law for universal and compulsory military training and service in the United States, and to enact all laws that may be necessary to the end that the Government of the United States may prepare in the fullest measure to uphold the dignity and honor of this country."

Very truly, yours, HOWARD G. HETZLER,
President.

Attest:

WARREN GORRELL,
Secretary.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I present a telegram setting forth resolutions pertaining to the present war, adopted at a mass meeting called in Lincoln, Nebr., by the mothers of that city.

I also present a memorial adopted by the House of Representatives of the Nebraska Legislature, and I also present an open letter in the shape of a memorial directed to the Members of the Senate and the House of Representatives by Mr. Bryan. I ask that they be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram, memorial, and letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LINCOLN, NEBR., April 1, 1917.

Hon. G. W. NORRIS,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

The following resolutions were unanimously adopted this afternoon by 1,200 citizens of Lincoln, Nebr., called together in mass meeting by over 100 patriotic mothers of the city. The meeting was eloquently and patriotically addressed by Dr. A. L. Bixby, Rev. P. H. Harmon, and Rev. A. L. Weatherby. The resolutions as adopted:

"The Nation stands to-day on the brink of war. It has been brought to this crisis by the criminal aggressions of a maddened belligerent across the water, supplemented by long-continued militaristic propoganda at home and the desire of Americans holding billions of the paper of foreign Governments to bring their investments to par. We have confidence in the wisdom and patriotism of the President and Congress at this time of great responsibility, and if their verdict be for war, we are with them, ready to do our part in a just cause with all the personal sacrifice that it entails and with naught of pecuniary reward; but we would have the President and Congress continue to realize that the great heart of the Nation is still for peace and not for war, unless refraining from war means submitting to evils greater, if that be possible, than war itself. And if it be possible by any means short of war to cause Germany to refrain from destruction of American lives, even though she continue to destroy the property of American citizens, we urge that war be avoided and the adjustment of such property questions be deferred, as we are properly doing in the case of England, until after the war. Particularly do we urge that the bill proposing universal military training be defeated. Its bayonets have supported every autocracy in Europe. It has been the resort of every ruler who has sought to stem the rising tide of democracy and to keep the laborers and producers of the world from entering into their inheritage. In this fateful hour, when such autocracies are crumbling to their fall, it is no time for the United States to grasp the weapon they have so long wielded and marshal our young men in times of peace into armed camps, particularly when to do so is to renounce the ideals we have cherished as a Nation from its birth. Confident of the justice of the American cause in the present crisis, grateful to Congress and the President for the patience hitherto displayed in the handling of our foreign affairs, the prayers of the mothers of men, upon whom the sacrifices of war will fall, are with our national administration to-day that it shall do straight thinking, keep its head cool and its heart warm to the desires and the aspirations, though unspoken, of the great masses of our people, and above all that it shall be true to the highest ideals for which our beloved Nation stands, wherever that course shall lead.

LINCOLN, NEBR., March 31, 1917.

HON. GEORGE W. NORRIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The following motion has been adopted in the House of Representatives of the State of Nebraska March 31, 1917:

"I beg leave to move the assurance to our great President of our unswerving loyalty to him in anything he may undertake to protect the honor and dignity of the United States in the present world crisis, but we believe the President expresses the true sentiment of the American people when on February 3, 1917, before Congress, he said:

"'We do not desire any hostile conflict with the Imperial German Government. We are the sincere friends of the German people, and earnestly desire to remain at peace with the Government which speaks for them.'

"We honor the President for up to this time keeping America out of war and its attendant consequences, and as representatives of the people of the State of Nebraska we earnestly hope that he will continue to do so.

"We feel that war would only increase the loss of life and property, and that it is the duty of America to prevent suffering, not to join in the work of further destruction. We fear that war would not quench but feed the fires of militarism. If we become belligerents, we cease to be neutrals and become engulfed in European politics.

"We believe that a course by our Government which will defer settlement of grievances until the present war is over will give the United States the opportunity to be the leader in the great international peace movement crying to be born. To stay out of war demands more courage, more patriotism, and more self-sacrifice than going to war; but it will give America the moral leadership for all time to come.

"I ask the foregoing as the sentiment of this house on the great question agitating the Nation.

"I move that a copy hereof be sent to our Congressmen and Senators at Washington."

"J. J. MCALLISTER."

Mr. McAllister moved the adoption of the motion, which was carried.

G. W. POTTS,
Chief Clerk.
GEORGE JACKSON,
Speaker.

MIAMI, FLA., March 28, 1917.

To the Members of the United States Senate and House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: Exercising the citizen's right of petition, I appeal to you. The dispute with Germany has passed beyond the domain of diplomacy and some advise settlement by the sword. The metropolitan press, which tried to prevent the reelection of the President and failed, undismayed by a popular verdict of more than one-half million, now seeks to lash the country into a fury and urges the Government to take part in the European conflict.

To you, and to you only, is given constitutional authority to declare war—war which, in this case, may mean the signing of the death warrant of thousands, even millions, of your countrymen and the laying of grievous burdens upon future generations. Before you take this blood upon your hands consider, I pray you, first, that the wrongs which you would punish, cruel and unjustifiable as they are, are not intended primarily against this country, but are acts of desperation directed against other nations with which the offenders are at war. Second, that our land is not threatened with invasion, but that we are asked to go 3,000 miles for a chance to fight. Third, that we have not the excuse for going to war that the European nations had. They had no machinery for peace; we have a peace plan offered by this Nation to the world and now embodied in 30 treaties with three-quarters of the population of the globe. The plan has the indorsement of the President, the commendation of the Senate, and the approval of the people at the polls. It provides for investigation of all disputes by an international tribunal before resort to war.

Fortunately these treaties compel us to employ the plan with Great Britain, France, Italy, and Russia before going to war with them. Germany formally approved the plan, although no treaty has yet been concluded with her. Shall we repudiate our own plan the first time we have an opportunity to employ it?

If, as the President recently declared, the American people do not want war, is it not worth while to try the peace plan before bringing upon the people the horrors of war? Until an attempt is made and fails no one is able to say that it would be impossible to secure the suspension of "ruthless" submarine warfare during the investigation for which the plan provides. Shall we deny to ourselves the credit of trying to settle the dispute with the treaty plan?

And is it not worth while to do our part in trying to avoid injury? Would it not be better as well as cheaper for the Government to carry on its own vessels such Americans as must go to Europe rather than engage in war to vindicate the right of citizens to disregard all risks and ride upon belligerent ships?

Is it not worth while to separate passengers from contraband cargoes, so that the captains of passenger ships can give their entire attention to the safety of the passengers? Our Nation is the world's foremost advocate of peace; if we go to war, it should be for a cause which history will justify.

If you reach the conclusion that nothing but war will satisfy the Nation's honor, is it too much to ask that, by a referendum, you consult the wishes of those who must, in case of war, defend the Nation's honor with their lives?

As one who expects to live up to a citizen's duties if war comes, I plead with you to use all honorable means to preserve peace before you take the responsibility of plunging our beloved land into this unprecedented struggle, begun without any sufficient cause and conducted by both sides in utter disregard of the well-settled rights of neutrals.

Very truly, yours,

WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN.

Mr. FERNALD. At a meeting of the public safety committee of 100 appointed by the governor of Maine, there was adopted the following resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

There being no objection, the resolution was read, as follows:

D. W. HOEGG, Jr.,
Secretary.

Whereas the Federal Government of the United States of America has since the beginning of the European war exercised a patience and forbearance toward the Imperial German Government such as no great nation ever before accorded to another under similar conditions; and

Whereas by this evidence of our great desire for peace this Nation has acquired an unenviable reputation wholly at variance with the character of our people; and

Whereas the German Government has by repeated acts of insolence, violence, treachery, and ruthlessness made it no longer possible to submit and retain our commercial rights, protect our citizens, uphold national honor, or act for humanity and the future of civilization. Be it

Resolved, That we hereby urge Maine Senators and Representatives to act and vote in the next Congress with all possible promptness in declaring that war exists and to aid in using the power of this Nation against the German forces.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I present sundry resolutions and petitions from citizens of my State for and against war with Germany and for and against military training. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD without the signatures, but stating after each resolution the number of signers.

DETROIT, MICH., March 30, 1917.

Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
United States Senator from Michigan, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Citizens' League, No. 12, exercising its right of petition appeals to you to vote against war. Among the many valid reasons sent to you in other appeals and protests, we wish to call your attention to the fact that the American Nation is composed of citizens coming either directly or by extraction from the very nations now engaged in the European war. For this very reason we are opposed to war with any of the principal nations now at war, conducted by both in disregard of established rights of neutrals.

The wrongs which you would punish with war are not intended against this country. We appeal to you not to take this blood on your hands and conscience. We are actuated by love for our country—America—convinced it is best for the interest, present and future welfare of our country, not to declare war. The local press, with possibly one exception, urges fanatically the Government to take part in the conflict. Be not misled. Do not believe this to be the sentiment of the people. The Citizens' League No. 12 represents 500 families, with as many and more voters. We adopted resolutions requesting you to vote against war and to acquaint you with our sentiments. As citizens we find our duty regarding our country laid down in the Constitution of our country, the laws of the land, and last but not least in Holy Writ, Romans 13, 1–4: "Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers," etc. Our loyalty should not be questioned. In conformity with this, we petition you to vote against war.

DETROIT, MICH., March 30, 1917.

Senator TOWNSEND,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR AND HONORABLE SIR: We have prayed for peace, we have voted for peace, we have and do now petition for peace. You have publicly stated that this European war is a shame and a blot to modern civilization; will you help blot the pages of American history with its blood?

We are not Socialists, but we know that many seats in the congressional halls of Washington, D. C., will be taken by Socialists in a few years, if Congress indorses and declares "a state of war."

Very sincerely, yours,

WM. T. GRUENEWALD
(And 38 others).

Respectfully submitted to Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND, United States Senate, by the American Citizens' League, of Blumfield, Saginaw County, Mich.:

We as citizens of the United States do hereby protest against drawing this country into a war with Germany, for the following reasons:

1. Both England and Germany have violated our rights under international law.

2. England has made itself guilty of violations of our American rights under international law no less serious than those committed by Germany, e. g., mining of the illegal war zone, which resulted in the destruction of five American ships with loss of American lives.

3. We deem it a flagrant injustice to acquiesce in England's blockade and to punish Germany for her war-zone decree. What is right toward England ought to be proper toward Germany.

4. We want our Government to uphold American rights and protect American commerce foursquare against all the world, but since we have waived our rights to one group of belligerents we consider it unjust, unneutral, and incompatible with the honesty of the Nation to uphold them against another group of belligerents.

We are opposed to one-man power, and stand by you in resisting any usurpation of what the Constitution makes the sole right of Congress, the making and declaring of war.

As citizens of the United States we look upon it as our patriotic duty to inform you as to our sentiment.

F. C. MOLL
(And 97 others).

DETROIT, MICH., March 30, 1917.

To the Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The undersigned citizens of the United States do beg you to use your influence to prevent war against Germany.

The facts ascertained through good authority are these:

1. England has made itself guilty of violations of our American rights under international law no less serious than those committed by Germany, e. g., mining of the illegal war zone, resulting in the destruction of five American ships with loss of American lives.

2. Germany was willing to abide by the declaration of London; to abandon unlawful submarine warfare against merchant vessels if her enemies could and would be brought to abide by international law; to meet her adversaries in peace council, as suggested by President Wilson, and lay her terms upon the table. England, on the other hand, rendered all overtures null and void.

3. Prominent Members of Congress hold that war could and should be avoided. We beg that you be one of these.

Respectfully,

Rev. J. M. GUGEL
(And 27 others).

Resolution.

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Whereas the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the United States Senate (S. Rept. 4253, pt. 1, 59th Cong.) shows that the Mormon Church teaches polygamy as a divinely ordained system of marriage, and that many of the ruling authorities of said church live in polygamy: Now, therefore,

We do respectfully urge upon the Congress the speedy adoption of a resolution to amend the Federal Constitution as follows:

"ARTICLE XVIII.

"SECTION 1. Polygamy and polygamous cohabitation shall not exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

"SEC. 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

Adopted by public meeting, Detroit, Mich., March 27, 1917.

MARCH 29, 1917.

To our United States Senators, Hon. WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH and Hon. CHARLES S. TOWNSEND, and our Congressman, Hon. PATRICK H. KELLEY:

Inasmuch as President Wilson has summoned Congress to meet in extra session on April 2, 1917, to consider "questions of grave international policy," and in view of the strenuous efforts now being made throughout the East to secure action that will send our American boys into the European trenches, we, the undersigned citizens, thinking only of America, desire to express our most earnest disapproval of any such policy. If this Nation is attacked we should "fight until the last man is dead" in defense of our sacred soil, but we are opposed to any policy that will send American soldiers to kill and die on a European battlefield in the present European war.

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned, citizens of this country and residing at Springwells, Mich., urgently request you to do all in your power to keep us out of war. Resolutions passed by the University Club of Ann Arbor, Mich., March 27, 1917.

Whereas the country is now virtually in a state of war and everywhere recognized to be without adequate land and naval forces for its defense; and

Whereas the General Staff of the Army, the National Guard, all patriotic and defense organizations, and military experts generally appear to be in agreement that some form of compulsory military service is imperative if the life of the Nation is to be safeguarded: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the members of the University Club at the University of Michigan urge upon the Congress of the United States the enaction into law at the earliest possible moment of the Chamberlain bill for universal training as the necessary first step in this direction; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be forwarded to the President of the United States, to the United States Senators from Michigan, and to our Representatives in Congress.

Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

We, your petitioners, Americans, constitutionists, most earnestly protest against the enactment of the so-called Chamberlain bill making compulsory military service, with a prison sentence unless consent to serve is given, as being un-American, unwarranted; and we as earnestly petition you as our representative in the enacting of laws to govern our country and ourselves, to use your utmost efforts to defeat the Chamberlain bill and all other bills that may be introduced for the purpose of compelling unwilling military service by the enforcement of penalties so drastic.

M. VIRGINIA DICKINSON
(And 16 others).

The following resolutions were adopted at a mass meeting held in Detroit Monday evening, March 26, 1917:

"Whereas a jingo propaganda, led and encouraged by Lord Northcliffe's American newspapers, munition manufacturers, the Shipping Trust, the Morgan syndicate, and the holders of war securities, seeks to plunge this peaceful and happy Nation into the vortex of war by a prolonged shriek for war, amid declarations of patriotism; and

"Whereas neutrality and peace—America's contribution to the laws of the world and equally as sacred as the American flag—are now and have for over two years been demanded by a great majority of our American people; and

"Whereas the President of the United States has by his public declarations—that the United States can no longer tread the path its founders marked out for it—has by the interposing of his hand and head between the belligerents departed from the past policy of the United States, thus substituting for the Monroe doctrine a new one—the Wilson doctrine; and

"Whereas the power of changing our condition from peace to war is vested in Congress and can never be surrendered or intrusted to the "one-man" power of the President without grave dangers arising for our American institutions and liberties; and

"Whereas in the abandonment of our traditional policy of separation from the politics and affairs of Europe the United States is taking a step momentous, which not only means abandoning our utter aloofness from the complications of European politics, but includes the absolute surrender of the position which we have maintained against all comers with regard to the American Republics south of our border; and

"Whereas the taxpaying people, already overburdened by the high cost of living, and not the President and his Cabinet, can change the character of this Government, and this people should be consulted as to the propriety and necessity of a war urged on us at this time by this new Wilson doctrine; and

"Whereas we, the delegates of the amalgamated German-American, Austro-American, and Hungarian-American societies, together with many patriotic sympathizers, representing over 50,000 citizens, have in public meeting assembled and discussed the dangers threatening our American liberties and institutions and find the course of our country at this time serious and un-American: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we demand of our representatives—the honorable Senators from the State of Michigan and the Congressmen from the two congressional districts of Detroit—earnestly to guard the sacred rights delegated to them by the sovereign people by offering stout resistance to the jingo war propaganda.

"Resolved, That we demand of our representatives to stand in harmony with the founders of our country—firmly for American doctrine of neutrality, firmly for peace, firmly for the Monroe doctrine.

"Resolved, That we, in keeping with the admonitions contained in George Washington's Farewell Address, urge upon our representatives the necessity of keeping each department of the Government strictly within its constitutional limitations: 'The President of the United States must not invite, initiate, or declare a war, and any and every encroachment, no matter under what colorable authority, must be rejected.'

"Resolved, That we, in harmony with all true Americans, beginning with George Washington, declare a departure from the Monroe doctrine and the substitution of this new Wilson doctrine, without the consent of the governed, to be un-American and dangerous.

"Resolved, That we declare a war caused by our intervention in European affairs an unjust war, which, for reasons of patriotism and conscience, we can not sanction.

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the President and to the Michigan delegation in both Houses of the Congress."

Signed by August Marxhausen, Dr. Charles H. Ruesskamp, Dr. Emil Rosinger, Henry Andries, Wilhelm F. Thiemt, Jacob Mack, Edward J. Messerich, Jacob Duschinsky, Carl Bauer, Henry Pfeiffer, and Gustav Misch.

Whereas the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the United States Senate (S. Rept. 4253, pt. 1, 59th Cong.) shows that the Mormon Church teaches polygamy as a divinely ordained system of marriage, and that many of the ruling authorities of said church live in polygamy: Now, therefore,

We do respectfully urge upon the Congress the speedy adoption of a resolution to amend the Federal Constitution as follows:

"ARTICLE XVIII.

"SECTION 1. Polygamy and polygamous cohabitation shall not exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

"SEC. 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

Adopted by the churches of Ypsilanti, Mich., March 25, 1917.

Hon. C. E. TOWNSEND,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR FRIEND TOWNSEND: We believe you are in a position to assist the American people to retain the freedom of the American citizenship of the United States, and we believe you are interested in the welfare of every citizen of our country, "The land of the free and the home of the brave." Therefore we ask you to work and vote against the bill that "provides that American citizens between the ages of 19 and 26 be compelled to submit to compulsory military drill or pay a fine of $1,000 or serve a year in prison, or both." We believe this is against us as a people of the United States; and we believe it is a bill in favor of the rich, as they could easily pay the $1,000 fine; and it will bring disgrace upon thousands of our American homes, as this very thing has worked havoc in Prussia.

We thank you for your help to keep us as our forefathers intended—"The land of the free and the home of the brave."

Yours, truly,

J. E. EDWARDS.

This is to certify that we, the undersigned American citizens of the United States, do petition against the passing of the Chamberlain bill, which provides that "American citizens between the ages of 19 and 26 be compelled to submit to compulsory military drill or pay a fine of $1,000 or serve a year in prison, or both."

We oppose the passage of this bill.

J. E. EDWARDS

DETROIT, March 27, 1917.

Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND.

DEAR SIR: Being fully convinced that neither the honor nor the safety of our country necessitates a declaration of war against Germany and that such declaration and its consequences would be a dire calamity for our Nation;

Knowing, furthermore, by the testimony of trustworthy persons that prominent Members of Congress hold that this war could and should be avoided,

We, the undersigned citizens of the United States, ask you very urgently to use your utmost influence to keep our beloved country out of this war.

Allow us also to remind you that the responsibility is yours, for our Constitution gives the right to declare war to Congress only.

Thanking you for your endeavors, we remain,

Very respectfully, yours,

WILLIAM STEPHAN
(And 18 others).

DETROIT, MICH., March 29, 1917.

Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: We, the undersigned citizens of Detroit, your constituents, insist that a way out of the present crisis can be found without loss of honor and without committing an act of unneutrality and injustice. Both parties in the European struggle have violated international law. Five of our ships were sunk because England illegally mined certain zones, causing loss of American lives. Why then should we declare war against one side alone? You know that Germany was willing to abide by the declaration of London, to abandon submarine warfare against merchant vessels if her enemies could and would be brought to abide by the rules of international law. She was willing to meet her adversaries in peace council as submitted by President Wilson. It was England, however, who rendered all overtures null and void. Under these circumstances we do not want war. Since you are our representative in Congress we urge you to vote against a declaration of war. You certainly are aware that Germany is not waging war against us, but against England. We did not interfere when England blockaded Germany. If we had, there would have been trouble and, probably, bloodshed. Why should we wear a chip on our shoulder now when Germany blockades England? We Americans boast of our love of fair play. Why should we not let them fight it out amongst themselves? If our financiers are trembling for their money loaned to the entente, that is their business. We are not under obligations to have our boys killed in order to save England. Let us stick to the Monroe doctrine and beware of the new Wilson doctrine.

Yours, for justice and peace,

L. LIST

Mr. PHELAN. I present sundry telegrams from associations in the State of California on the subject of war and peace, and ask that they be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., March 30, 1917.

Hon. JAMES D. PHELAN,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

The following telegram has this date been sent to the President of the United States:

"This message to you, the President of the United States, conveys the profound conviction of the American League of California that the present conditions call for a declaration that a state of war exists with Germany and a full union with the allies in money, men, and munitions. Our honor, the peace that is to come, our dignity in the future councils of the nations, our weight as a champion for the rights of neutrals, our reputation for sincerity, the call of humanity, as well as our own future, all demand that we proceed to armed defense and attack. It seems a God-given moment when, as a nation, fresh and unexhausted, with men, money, and food without limit, we are now also compelled by self-respect and duty as well as the national welfare, to lend unstinted help to the cause of civilization and democracy now in imminent danger. Let us devote ourselves fully to this cause, for it is the cause for which this Nation was brought into this world, and no longer can the peace loving find excuse for hesitation. Our safety at the close of the war also compels us to join the allies, so that we may not be left alone to fight Germany. No protestation can any longer be made in good faith by a courageous nation that our cause is not the cause of the allies, who are fighting for the small nations, and the neutral nations, and for democracy against ferocity, vandalism, and self-aggrandizement. We can not sit idle any longer. France and England, and now the Russian freemen, are fighting generously for each other without count of cost. Are we to be found adding and subtracting the total of our losses and gains? Mercy for all mankind and for the German people calls for a vigorous and aggressive, far, and complete union with the allies, that the war may come quickly to an end."

Hon. JAMES D. PHELAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

I urge upon you, as a duty you owe the Nation and the American people, to demand legislation that will provide compulsory military service and training. No more monstrous iniquity could be perpetrated upon a people than to permit enthusiastic patriotic and liberty-loving citizens to volunteer, while slackers, cowards, and pacifists remain at home reaping benefits that justly belong to those who die upon the field of battle. Half-way measures are worse than useless, tending, as they do, to lull our citizens into a sense of false security. We must be either completely prepared or we had better squarely face the issue, renounce our liberty, and become the vassals of some foreign country. There can be no middle course, and if we are to maintain our liberty it can only be with the assistance of men in your position, who will see to it that proper legislation will be forthcoming.

SANTA BARBARA, CAL., April 2, 1917.

Senator J. D. PHELAN,
Washington, D. C.:

Whereas the hour has come when it is no longer possible for the American people to ignore the stern reality that our civilization has been challenged, our neutral rights attacked, our flag subjected to derision, our ships driven from the seas or sunk in violation of long-established laws, our safety menaced by the plottings of a militaristic caste, our citizens murdered while following legitimate pursuits; and

Whereas our Government, after many useless protests and after exhausting infinite patience, while hoping for a cessation of these hostile demonstrations against the common welfare of our people only to find an aggravation of the offenses, has considered it imperative to sever diplomatic relations with the German Empire; and

Whereas the grave warning of our serious resolve has been met by further and more violent depredations, leaving no middle ground for a self-respecting nation but rather opening the one course that we may pursue: Be it therefore

Resolved by the people of Santa Barbara, Cal., in assembly on this 2d day of April, 1917, That we solemnly pledge to our President and to the Congress our unqualified and undivided support in any action that by these authorities may be deemed necessary to sustain national dignity and honor, and to protect our people wherever they may be on lawful errands, and to uphold the flag wherever it may rightfully flow as an emblem of liberty and enlightenment; and be it further

Resolved, That in support of this firm determination we urge upon Congress the prompt adoption of the policy of universal military training, believing it the only adequate assurance against aggression; and be it further

Resolved, That these resolutions be telegraphed to the President and copies sent to Senators JAMES D. PHELAN and HIRAM W. JOHNSON and Representative E. A. HAYES.

WILLIS M. SLOSSON, Mayor.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I am in receipt of many telegrams and petitions touching upon the form which the senders feel the military legislation should take. I ask permission of the Senate to send those petitions and telegrams to the Committee on Military Affairs without encumbering the RECORD with them, and without further motion to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. PHELAN. I object.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I think the Senator has that right without the consent of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair supposes that the Senator can send anything he desires to the Committee on Military Affairs without permission of the Senate.

Mr. PHELAN subsequently said: Mr. President, when I made objection to the request of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] I was under the impression that his request covered all the telegrams and memorials which have been submitted this morning, in order to relieve the RECORD. I learn that the Senator made the request only with respect to telegrams and memorials received by him from his own State. I desire, therefore, to withdraw my objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The objection is withdrawn.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I desire to say that I have received a great many telegrams on both sides of the question that is now before the American people. I have not felt that it was necessary to present them for printing in the RECORD, because I thought they were intended for my advice. They are along the lines of some that have been read into the RECORD already. I merely state the fact that both sides to the controversy have been telegraphing me on the subject.

Mr. NELSON. I present a resolution adopted by the Legislature of Minnesota, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved, That the senate of the State of Minnesota does hereby heartily and unreservedly indorse the policy of the President of the United States as set forth in the bill to authorize the President to arm the merchant ships of the United States for the purpose of protecting American lives and commerce, for the defense of American rights and to uphold the dignity and honor of this Nation.

That the senate does hereby also indorse the action of the President in calling a special session of the Congress of the United States for the purpose of enacting said bill into law, and for the purpose of passing such other measures as may be necessary for the security of the Nation in its present crisis.

That the senate does hereby commend, approve, and indorse the Hon. KNUTE NELSON and the Hon. FRANK B. KELLOGG, United States Senators, and each of the Members of the House of Representatives who voted in favor of said armed neutrality bill for their strong patriotic support of the President.

That the secretary of the senate is hereby instructed to forward copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, to Senators KNUTE NELSON, FRANK B. KELLOGG, and to each of the Members of the House of Representatives of the United States from Minnesota.

STATE OF MINNESOTA, SENATE CHAMBER.

I, George W. Peachey, secretary of the senate, in and for the State of Minnesota, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of a resolution adopted by the senate unanimously on the 16th day of March, 1917.

Dated this 17th day of March, 1917.

GEO. W. PEACHEY,
Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. NELSON presented petitions of Local Lodge No. 1, Native Sons of America, of St. Paul, and of the Young Men's Club, St. Mark's Church, of Minneapolis, in the State of Minnesota, favoring the foreign policy of the President, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I wish to state that I have received a great many telegrams both for and against the resolution declaring war. Those telegrams I thought were intended for my information, and therefore I did not bring them to the Senate Chamber this morning. I make this statement in order that the people who sent them may understand why they do not appear in the RECORD. I have received a number of telegrams from persons living in towns in favor of war, and I have received a great many more letters from people living in the country protesting against war and hoping that it may be averted. I simply desire to make this statement.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, like my colleagues, I have received numerous telegrams and petitions from hundreds of good citizens of Michigan protesting against war and urging a peaceful settlement of our international disputes, and many telegrams and letters urging support of the President. I desire to read one which I have just received from Detroit, Mich. It is addressed to me, and is as follows:

One hundred thousand persons in the city of Detroit have within the past two weeks signed the following declaration:

"To the President of the United States: As an American faithful to American ideals of justice, liberty, and humanity and confident that the Government has exerted its most earnest efforts to keep us at peace with the world, I hereby declare my absolute and unconditional loyalty to the Government of the United States and pledge my support to you in protecting American rights against unlawful violence upon land and sea, in guarding the Nation against hostile attacks, and in upholding international rights"—

Signed by the Citizens Committee on National Defense, Edwin Denby, chairman.

I have just received the following telegram from Ann Arbor, Mich., which I should like to read. It is addressed to me, and is as follows:

Whereas our Government, in severing diplomatic relations with Germany, gave notice that further overt acts of war would be forcibly resisted; and

Whereas such overt acts have been committed in the sinking of the Laconia, the City of Memphis, the Illinois, the Vigilancia, and other vessels, with the loss of American lives: Be it therefore

Resolved, That we hold the time has now come when it is the duty of this Nation to take part in the common task of defending civilization and human liberty against German military aggression, and we call upon the Congress to take such action as may be necessary in the premises.

That is signed by some of the faculty of the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor.

There is one more telegram which has just been handed to me, and from Saginaw, Mich., which I desire to read.

It is addressed to me, as follows:

It is impossible to remain neutral. If we do, we will deserve the contempt both of friend and foe. Life and honor, wealth and blood, everything for our country. Stand by the President.

Signed by the Polish Falcons' Alliance of Michigan by its respective officers.

I will not detain the Senate at this time with other evidences of the great interest and earnest solicitude upon the part of the people of Michigan in the present national crisis, but shall take the liberty of presenting these petitions, resolutions, and telegrams to my colleagues of the Committee on Foreign Relations and to the Committee on Military Affairs. The present situation is most regrettable. I wish our differences could be composed without the sacrifice of our national honor or the impairment of our prestige; but the President has spoken for our country, and we must address ourselves dispassionately to a most difficult and disagreeable duty.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I have received a number of telegrams from citizens of Montana in regard to our foreign relations and the prospects of war. I have selected one from all of the number received, because it embodies and expresses my sentiments. I send it to the desk and ask that it be read. It is signed by a committee of several gentlemen of prominence and high standing. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD with the names of the signers; and I want to say in this connection that I am unqualifiedly in accord with the sentiments expressed in the telegram and give them my hearty approval. They express a true spirit of patriotism.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the telegram, as follows:

KALISPELL, MONT., April 1, 1917.

Senator HENRY MYERS,
Washington, D. C.:

At the biggest mass meeting ever held in Kalispell, filling two of the largest halls in the city to overflowing, resolutions were unanimously adopted directing this committee to ask you to stand by the President and the country in the unqualified assertion of our rights on the high seas and everywhere, even though such a course involve the country in war to the last ditch. This is our answer to the peace-at-any-price manifesto now being published throughout the West. Kalispell now has two companies of soldiers ready for any eventuality, and more to follow if necessary.

J. E. ERICKSON.
ANDREW SWANEY.
W. J. BRENNEN.
GEO. H. GRUBB.
SIDNEY M. LOGAN.

Mr. McKELLAR. I present a telegram from the chairman of a mass meeting of citizens of Chattanooga, Tenn., in reference to war, and ask that it may be read.

There being no objection, the telegram was read, as follows:

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., April 3, 1917.

Senator K. D. MCKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.:

We, the citizens of Chattanooga, in mass meeting assembled, recognizing the perilous condition that confronts our Nation at present, do hereby pledge our support to the national administration, pledging our aid and service in any plan that may be devised or adopted, in the wisdom of the administration, to the end that the lives of our people may be protected on the high seas and the honor and integrity of the Republic and the manhood of its citizens may be sustained and defended, whether at home or abroad. We believe that the volunteer system of raising an army is not justified in theory or in fact. We further believe that the only safeguard of our present and our future consists in the adoption of universal military training, a system calculated to engender the highest order of patriotism among the people of a democracy and at the same time preserve peace at home and protection for our citizens abroad. We renew our allegiance to the Stars and Stripes and we patriotically offer to our Government whatever might be required by it for the purpose of obtaining full recognition of our rights. From now on there can be but two classes of people in this country—Americans and traitors.

FOSTER V. BROWN,
Chairman of Meeting.

Mr. McKELLAR. I also present telegrams from citizens of Memphis and Chattanooga, in my State, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senator MCKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.:

The members of the National League for Woman's Service, Chattanooga branch, in official and individual capacity, urge active cooperation with allies, unqualified protection of American rights, and universal military training in the United States, and request that pacifist propaganda and demonstrations be branded as traitorous and destructive to public welfare.

Mrs. DWIGHT MONTAGUE.

MEMPHIS, TENN., April 2, 1917.

Hon. K. D. MCKELLAR,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

Twenty-seven of our thirty-three employees have signed asking you to support the President's war measures.

N. O. NELSON CO.

Mr. KNOX presented petitions of sundry citizens of Munhall and Uniontown, in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for universal compulsory military training, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Wayne County, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation to found the Government of the United States on Christianity, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President, I have received a great many telegrams from all sections of my State. Most of them have strongly indorsed the position of the President. I have not brought them with me, and shall not undertake to have them inserted in the RECORD. It seems to me that there will be enough in the RECORD without them. I feel, however, that I am justified in saying that in no State of the Union are the people more heartily and patriotically behind the President in this crisis than in the State of Kentucky; and I believe that the admirable address which the President delivered to Congress last night will meet practically the unanimous indorsement and approval of the people of the State of Kentucky.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I present a petition from sundry citizens of the city of Everett, in the State of Washington, requesting a Federal investigation of certain labor troubles which have disturbed that portion of the State for some time, and which finally culminated in certain acts of violence and the death of a number of people. I ask that the petition be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and I sincerely trust that that committee will give it real consideration, because it is a serious problem which ought to be dealt with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I also present a telegram embodying a resolution adopted by the faculty of the University of Washington relative to the action of the President and to military preparedness, sustaining the action of the President, and in favor of universal compulsory military training; together with resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of citizens of the city of Spokane, and also resolutions from an overflow mass meeting of citizens of Spokane, who were not able to obtain admission to the building, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEATTLE, WASH., April 3, 1917.

Senator MILES POINDEXTER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

At a called meeting of the faculty of the University of Washington you were requested to favor the passage of the provisions similar to those contained in House bill 11970 of the Sixty-fourth Congress, relative to the promotion of officers, and to oppose any curtailment of the number of officers authorized in the national-defense act; and further the faculty declared itself in favor of compulsory universal military training for all able-bodied male citizens of the United States of suitable military age; and, moreover, the faculty desires to express its loyalty and support in whatever action the Government of the United States may see fit to take in upholding the honor and dignity of our country.

HENRY SUZZALLO, President.

SPOKANE, WASH., March 26, 1917.

Hon. MILES POINDEXTER,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At a mass meeting called by representatives of 50 patriotic and civic organizations, 5,000 citizens of Spokane met at the State armory Sunday afternoon to express their devotion to their country, and their earnest desire to uphold the hands of the President in this crisis in the life of the Nation; the following resolution was adopted by a standing vote:

"We are a peace-desiring and justice-loving Nation, averse to war and craving the friendship of our world neighbors.

"But enduring world peace and international fraternity must be founded on certain definite principles. Among these are the freedom and safety of the seas, respect for international law, regard for the territorial and other rights of small nations, nonsecret diplomacy, and the abolition of oppression.

"These and other fundamental principles have been challenged, and with that challenge we have seen our citizens killed at sea, our commerce sunk, our domestic safety and tranquility endangered by deeds of violence.

"In the rightful performance of his constitutional duties President Wilson has patiently protested against these wrongs, but his protests have gone unheeded.

"To deal with that deplorable situation the President has called Congress to assemble in special session, and the purpose of this gathering of the citizenship of Spokane is to express its cordial approval of the President's action. To furtherance of that purpose we hereby pledge our patriotic support of the President and Congress in the performance of their constitutional powers and duties.

"We publicly affirm full and complete loyalty to our beloved country.

"We pledge our support to the President of the United States, the constitutional leader of the Nation.

"We assert our belief in the patriotism of the individual citizen, of whatever birth or former nationality.

"We believe that a spirit of patriotism, not surpassed in fervor of intensity at any time in our national history, lives in the hearts of the entire American people, which only awaits the call of the Nation's leader.

"In this hour of crisis we are Americans without division, loving our country, its institutions and its flag, and ready and willing to give them our material support and our patriotic service."

Thousands were unable to gain admission to the armory and an overflow meeting of 3,000 was held on the outside. It was addressed by a number of citizens, and the following resolution was adopted without a dissenting voice:

"Whereas a crisis in international affairs exists between the United States and Germany: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we approve in all respects the stand taken by President Wilson in his international dealings with Germany; and

"Resolved further, That we favor full adequate preparedness and universal military training for the defense of American rights on land and sea."

I have the honor to be, your most obedient servant,

N. W. DURHAM, Chairman.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I have just been handed a telegram from the Commercial Club of the city of Kimball, in my State, relating to the war situation of our Government, which I ask to have read.

There being no objection, the telegram was read, as follows:

KIMBALL, S. DAK., April 3, 1917.

Hon. ED. JOHNSON,
Washington, D. C.:

The people of this vicinity, and we believe of South Dakota, favor an active policy in the present crisis. We therefore urge you as our representative in Congress to stand by the President in his efforts to uphold the dignity and honor of the Nation.

KIMBALL COMMERCIAL CLUB,
DR. H. GALBRAITH,
President.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I also have received a telegram from the faculty of the university at Vermilion, S. Dak., which I would be much pleased to have made a matter of record, but as my colleague [Mr. STERLING] has presented a similar telegram I shall not ask to have it printed in the RECORD, although I desire to state that I feel very proud of the public-spirited expressions of these gentlemen.

I also present telegrams from Rev. W. H. Buenning, of Emery; A. P. Brown, of Canton; Rev. Jacob M. Tischetter, of Huron; and B. J. Brown, of Parkston, all of whom are among the most prominent and respected citizens of the State of South Dakota. I ask that the telegrams be printed in the RECORD, and that the views expressed in them may be given serious consideration by the Senate.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EMERY, S. DAK., April 2, 1917.

Hon. EDWIN S. JOHNSON,
Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We of the German Baptist Church, Plum Creek, 75 loyal citizens of the United States, do urgently entreat you to do all within your power to avert war.

W. H. BUENNING, Pastor.

CANTON, S. DAK., April 2, 1917.

Senator E. S. JOHNSON,
Washington, D. C.:

As your constituents we respectfully urge you to use all your influence in Congress to save our Nation from the horrors of an unnecessary war. Strong sentiment in this section against warlike measures. A petition signed by some 400 patriotic citizens being forwarded to Senator JOHNSON.

ARTHUR P. BROWN.
H. F. ELLIS.

HURON, S. DAK., March 17, 1917.

Senator ED. S. JOHNSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: One hundred members of the Krimmer Menonite Brethren Church, of Milford Township, Beadle County, S. Dak., hereby ask you to do all you possibly can to prevent the United States from declaring war on Germany.

KRIMMER MENONITE BRETHREN CHURCH,
By Rev. JACOB M. TISCHETTER.

PARKSTON, S. DAK., April 1, 1917.

Hon. EDWIN S. JOHNSON,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

In accordance with the overwhelming sentiment of your congressional district, we, your constituents and members of three local mutual benevolent associations of this vicinity to the number of 400, unanimously beg you as our representative in Congress to use all your influence and power to preserve our beloved country from being plunged into war, with the necessary awful results of bringing to a now happy and prosperous people indescribable misery, horror, sorrow, and death.

B. J. BROWN,
Vice President Holy Cross.
N. N. MEYER,
Secretary St. Leo.
A. J. GORMAN,
Secretary, Grand Knight, Knights of Columbus of America.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I have received a very large number of telegrams from Oklahoma, most of them standing strongly for the protection of the rights of the United States by whatever means are necessary, and expressing confidence in the President of the United States. A few were to the contrary effect, indicating that some of the people desire to avoid war and would go to almost any length to prevent it, but the overwhelming majority of the people of Oklahoma, according to these telegrams, are in favor of the course outlined by the President of the United States.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I have received a number of telegrams indorsing the President's message, and I have received a few urging that strong efforts be made by Congress for peace.

The Legislature of the State of Nevada, when in session—it has now adjourned—expressed the sentiments of the people of my State, I believe, most accurately in a joint resolution with regard to the message of the President on February 3, on the occasion of the breaking off of diplomatic relations with Germany. The statement of the legislature at that time expresses the sentiments of the people of the State at the present time, and I therefore ask that it be again read, so that it may be before the Senate at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested. The Chair hears no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

CARSON, NEV., February 5, 6.30 p. m.

Hon. KEY PITTMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The Legislature of Nevada in joint session assembled this day adopted the following resolution and it is signed by Emmit D. Boyle, governor; Maurice J. Sullivan, president of the senate; and Ben. D. Luce, speaker of the assembly:

"Nevada Senate and Assembly joint resolution approving the policies of the President of the United States in the matter of maintaining the rights of American citizens in travel and commerce.

"Whereas the President of the United States has decided that it is necessary to suspend diplomatic relations with a great nation toward whom our friendship has been shown by our long-continued patience and to advise and warn all nations that the rights of our citizens to travel and trade upon the high seas must be respected and will be maintained by the American people; and

"Whereas it is the solemn duty of every American, regardless of party or faith or family origin, to sustain and uphold our National Government at all times and particularly when our national honor and the principles of humanity and justice to which our Government is dedicated have been assailed: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the people of the State of Nevada, represented by the senate and assembly in joint session, do approve the policies of the President of the United States as stated in his address to the Congress of the United States on February 3, 1917, and with the hope as expressed by him that our Nation 'will not be challenged to defend our rights to liberty, justice, and unmolested life,' and do pledge the State of Nevada to the limit of its resources toward the maintenance of the honor of our Nation and the support of our President and the National Government; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution signed by the governor of the State of Nevada, the president of the senate, and the speaker of the assembly be transmitted by telegraph to the President of the United States and that an engrossed copy hereof certified under the great seal of the State of Nevada be transmitted by mail to the President of the United States."

EMMIT D. BOYLE, Governor.

UNIVERSAL MILITARY TRAINING.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Out of order I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill to provide for the military and naval training and service of citizens of the United States, which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. The bill is substantially one that was introduced at the last session of Congress, known as Senate bill 1695, and reported upon favorably by the Committee on Military Affairs, too late to be acted on before Congress adjourned.

The bill (S. 1) to provide for the military and naval training and service of citizens of the United States was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PUNISHMENT OF ESPIONAGE.

Mr. CULBERSON. Out of order I introduce a bill and ask its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (S. 2) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I send to the desk a list of assignments which were accorded to the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] by his associates on this side of the Chamber, the same having been submitted to him for his approval, and also to the other side of the Chamber for record. I ask unanimous consent that this be declared the list of committees on which the junior Senator from California will serve.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed order.

The SECRETARY. Mr. JOHNSON of California is assigned to the following committees of the Senate:

On Civil Service and Retrenchment.
On Coast and Insular Survey.
On Commerce.
On Fisheries.
On Immigration.
On Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.
On the Philippines.
On Woman Suffrage.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there further petitions or memorials? If not, reports of committees are in order.

WAR WITH GERMANY.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, from the Committee on Foreign Relations I present a report (S. Rept. No. 1) on Senate joint resolution 1, with certain amendments, and ask to have the report read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred Senate joint resolution No. 1, declaring that a state of war exists between the Imperial German Government and the Government and the people of the United States, and making provision to prosecute the same, having had the same under consideration, report the said joint resolution with the recommendation that it pass with the following amendments:

In the preamble strike out the words "the recent acts of"; strike out the word "are" after the words "Imperial German Government" and insert in lieu thereof the words "has committed repeated"; and after the words "United States" insert the words "of America," so that the clause will read as follows:

"Whereas the Imperial German Government has committed repeated acts of war against the Government and the people of the United States of America: Therefore be it."

Strike out all following the words "directed to," in line 7, and substitute therefor the following: "employ the entire naval and military forces of the United States and the resources of the Government to carry on war against the Imperial German Government; and to bring the conflict to a successful termination all of the resources of the country are hereby pledged by the Congress of the United States," so that the joint resolution as amended reads as follows:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the state of war between the United States and the Imperial German Government which has thus been thrust upon the United States is hereby formally declared; and that the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to employ the entire naval and military forces of the United States and the resources of the Government to carry on war against the Imperial German Government; and to bring the conflict to a successful termination all of the resources of the country are hereby pledged by the Congress of the United States."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, by direction of the Committee on Foreign Relations I now request unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask that the joint resolution go over for the day under the rule. I object to the request for unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, before any motion for adjournment is made I hope it will be possible to go on with morning business.

Mr. MARTIN. I was not contemplating making a motion to adjourn at this moment. I do contemplate making such a motion in a very few moments.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator from Virginia yield to me?

Mr. MARTIN. I will.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is possible that the Senator from Wisconsin objected to the present consideration of the joint resolution because the Senate has not yet before it a printed copy of the joint resolution as reported. If that is the reason why the Senator objects, I will say to him that within five minutes a printed copy will be on the desk of each Senator.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I object to the present consideration of the joint resolution, which under the rule, requires it to go over for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being an objection——

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, of course it is in the power of the Senator from Wisconsin to carry this joint resolution over until to-morrow. I am sure he has had too much experience to make it necessary for me to allude to the momentous consequences which are involved——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I do not think it is quite in conformity with the practice of the Senate to lecture a Senator who asks for one day's time on a joint resolution of this importance. I ask for the regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. MARTIN. The Senator is not at all justified in the remark he has made about my undertaking to lecture a Senator. Nothing was further from my mind. I had no idea of delivering a lecture to him or anybody else. I have a right, Mr. President, to call the attention of the Senate and of the Senator himself to the momentous consequences involved in this joint resolution——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it is quite unnecessary for the Senator to call my attention to the momentous consequences of this joint resolution. I think I realize them quite as fully as he does. I ask for the regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution must go over under the rule.

Mr. MARTIN. The joint resolution, of course, goes over, Mr. President, but I have a right to make some comments on this situation.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have asked for the regular order, and I ask for a ruling upon that request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There are no comments permissible now.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. They may be made later, but not now. Are there further reports of committees?

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, right here I desire to say that I do not believe the Senate ought to proceed to the consideration of any other matter until this momentous question is disposed of, and I therefore move that the Senate adjourn until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. McCUMBER. I hope the Senator will allow me——

Mr. MARTIN. I hope the Senator will excuse me; I can not yield for any business to come before the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is not business to come before the Senate. It is the introduction——

Mr. WILLIAMS. A motion to adjourn is pending.

Mr. MARTIN. I object to the presentation of business of any sort until the joint resolution declaring war is disposed of. I move that the Senate adjourn until 10 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire will state it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no doubt that the Chair, as is his uniform custom, will exert his influence to preserve order in the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is what the Chair is about to comment upon.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am very glad to know that fact.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Before the motion to adjourn is put, the Chair will state that there is a rule of the Senate which prevents manifestations of either approval or disapproval by the occupants of the galleries. The Chair assumes that the doorkeepers notified all who came into the galleries this morning that they must not manifest approval or disapproval. The rules of the Senate must be obeyed. If the doorkeepers will not discharge their duty, they must be removed and somebody put there who will; and if they discharge their duty from this time on the galleries will be cleared the moment there is an infraction of the rule.

The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia that the Senate adjourn until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, April 4, 1917, at 10 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 3, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Profoundly grateful, our Father in heaven, that we are citizens of the United States of America with its vast resources, varied industries, its phenomenal growth in all that makes a Nation great; its sacred institutions conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal; its history which challenges the admiration of the world; help us to realize that with every great privilege comes a great responsibility. We have met with courage and fortitude all the responsibilities of the past. We stand face to face with a new and grave responsibility, which shall test our courage and strength. And we pray most fervently that Thou wilt give us the strength and courage commensurate with the task before us. Grant that we may think wisely, act nobly, and put our trust in Thee, O God our Father, Author of right and truth and justice. And Thy name be praised forevermore. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for indefinite leave of absence for Mr. HELGESEN, of North Dakota, on account of illness.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for an indefinite leave of absence for Mr. HELGESEN on account of sickness. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Journal as read will be approved.

There was no objection.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for 10 days' leave of absence for my colleague [Mr. MEEKER] on account of sickness.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks for 10 days leave of absence for Mr. MEEKER on account of illness. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague [Mr. LEE] be granted indefinite leave of absence on account of sickness.

SWEARING IN OF A DELEGATE ELECT.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, the Hon. CHARLES A. SULZER, Delegate elect from Alaska, is present and desires to take the oath of office.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has the credentials of Mr. SULZER and they are regular in form. They are signed by the governor, the surveyor general, and the collector of customs, who seem to constitute the canvassing board.

Hon. CHARLES A. SULZER, Delegate elect from Alaska, appeared before the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD in the form of a brief resolution from the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce on the subject of the pay of officers and enlisted men of the naval and military service.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman to extend his remarks in the RECORD? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Vermont relating to Federal and State taxation of incomes and inheritances.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, either the Speaker will have to repeat what gentlemen want or they will have to speak so the House can understand them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will make this remark to the House. Everybody seems to have fallen into the habit of talking in a very feeble way. The Chair wishes they would lift up their voices so that people can hear them, because it contributes to keeping good order. The gentleman desires to print some resolution of the Vermont General Assembly.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection, but we must have some method of knowing what the subject matter is which it is proposed to extend in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is entirely correct. Without objection, the request will be granted. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing certain resolutions which are signed by the members of the Baltimore Chamber of Commerce and others connected with this organization, and also resolutions passed in reference to military training and our position in this war.

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent for one minute to read an important telegram.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the House for a minute. Is there objection?

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, on what subject?

Mr. SNYDER. This is a telegram from the farmers of the State of New York.

Mr. HOWARD. On what subject?

Mr. SNYDER. On a patriotic subject.

Mr. HOWARD. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the telegram referred to:

UTICA, N. Y., April 1, 1917.

Hon. HOMER P. SNYDER,
Congressional Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

The farmers of this State were in hopes that war might be honorably avoided, that peace might prevail. They, however, emphatically resent the infringements of the rights of their country, the ruthless submarine warfare, and disregard of international law on the part of Germany. We are solidly behind the President and Congress and any action or measures adopted or taken to uphold and maintain the honor and dignity of our country and the rights of our citizens. We shall endeavor to increase the production of our farms in the interest of all. We are ready to respond to any call.

F. W. SESSIONS,
President New York State Agricultural Society.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it is proper that I should explain to the Republican side of the House the resolution which has been made. The Republican committee on committees, making this recommendation to the House for the election on various committees which may be called upon to act soon, were the Republican members of those committees in the last House, leaving vacancies on all the other committees, which will be filled later and in some cases appointing now upon some of the committees members who will probably desire to go off those committees if they secure other committee assignments which they may wish. And the election to-day of those Members on those committees is not to be taken as final decision as to the committees upon which they will appear as permanent members.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. How soon will the committees be filled?

Mr. MANN. I can not say how soon the committee will be able to report a full committee list. This will give Republican representation on these committees and will give the committee on committees time, I hope, to consider and learn the wishes of all the Republican Members as to committee assignments, so that the recommendations may be made with more intelligence and care than it would be possible to make them to-day. But there are certain measures upon which action will be taken very speedily, either with or without the Republican representation, and we thought it desirable to put back on those committees the Members who would undoubtedly be placed upon the committees, and in some cases put back on those committees some Members who may wish to go off those committees in order to be transferred to other committees.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I am glad the opportunity has come for this side to show to the House and to the country its magnanimity and generosity and its superiority to my friends on the other side. Yesterday when we offered as committee assignments the best and most patriotic Members of this body the gentlemen on that side voted almost unanimously against them, and now I am going to ask this side to vote unanimously for all the committee assignments which have been suggested by the gentleman from Illinois. [Applause.] I want to say to this side that they have suggested the very best that they can do, and the very best they have, and I hope every gentleman will vote for them.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] are facetious but not very generous. Yesterday there was a contest as to who would have the selection of a majority of the members of the committees—a perfectly legitimate contest.

Now, in a lighter vein, permit me to suggest to the House how much better the action of the Republican committee on committees is than was the action of the Democratic committee on committees. They succeeded by a bare majority. We will have the unanimous support of the House. [Applause and laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The resolution was agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following:

Mr. KEATING requests permission to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in connection with the following bills, no adverse report having been made thereon:

H. R. 11901. Granting a pension to Charles O. Bitters;

H. R. 5246. Granting an increase of pension to Esther M. Eggleston; and
H. R. 18277. Granting an increase of pension to Christopher Hummel.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request will be granted.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. MANN. What is the purpose of this request?

Mr. KEATING. To avoid producing the same testimony again.

Mr. MANN. Well, these papers are now in the files. The files are subject to be called for by the committee that has jurisdiction of the subject. The gentleman does not have to withdraw these papers in order to get them before the committee if he reintroduces a bill. It would be a very bad practice to start in——

Mr. KEATING. Then I withdraw the request, Mr. Speaker. I understood I had to do that.

Mr. MANN. No. The committee gets them.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado withdraws the request.

PRINTING AND BINDING FOR COMMITTEES.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution No. 27.

Resolved, That each standing committee of the House of Representatives is hereby authorized to have such printing and binding done as may be actually necessary in the transaction of its official business during the Sixty-fifth Congress.

The SPEAKER. Without objection——

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, is this resolution similar to the resolution that was passed in the last Congress?

Mr. BARNHART. It is the same.

Mr. MANN. The same?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes; of course.

Mr. MANN. To obviate the old practice of each chairman asking for it?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes; that is the purpose of it.

Mr. HULBERT. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Printing what, if any, action has been made respecting the printing and dissemination of the speech delivered by the President last evening?

Mr. BARNHART. The chairman of the Committee on Printing has been advised—not officially, however—that the Senate has authorized the publication of a large number of copies of that address, and they have allotted to the House something like 20,000 copies that are now available, or soon will be, in the document room. Further than that we have no information, and until the committee ascertains what number has been sent to the document room, I think it would be well to let the matter rest.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. I yield.

Mr. MANN. How can the Senate send any of these documents to the House document room?

Mr. BARNHART. That was a question to me, but the information came from the clerk of the Committee on Printing indirectly.

Mr. MANN. Well, the Joint Committee on Printing has a secretary who frequently falls over. The Senate has no power to pass a Senate resolution to put a lot of these documents in the House document room. All we would get would be the usual number. Of course, they can pass a concurrent resolution. But we can print a very large number of copies of this message under the $500 limit without a concurrent resolution. Does not the gentleman think it would be wise to print some?

Mr. BARNHART. Indeed we would be perfectly willing to do it, but the committee would like to have the opportunity to investigate the information that has just come to us.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will ascertain within the next hour or so, so that he can bring the matter before the House.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. BARNHART. Certainly.

Mr. FERRIS. I want to remind the chairman of the Committee on Printing of the fact that as yet there are no copies of the Field Regulations available to patriotic organizations throughout the country who are organizing and writing in here for them. Anyone appealing to the War Department will be told that there are none there for distribution, and anyone calling upon the Public Printing Office will receive a reply to the effect that they did have these regulations for sale there, but there are none there now. I want to call attention to the fact that the American boys who are organizing and trying to show their patriotism and do something effective ought to be furnished with these regulations, and it is up to this country to educate them in so far as may be practicable by affording the necessary information. There are no copies of the Field Regulations available at this time.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Oklahoma will reintroduce his resolution, which it was impossible to get through in the last Congress, I feel quite sure that the Committee on Printing will give it very prompt consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SABATH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. Does the gentleman's resolution apply to all the committees?

Mr. BARNHART. To all the standing committees.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I did not quite catch the reply which the gentleman from Indiana made to the gentleman from Oklahoma as to the report on the Drill Regulations.

Mr. BARNHART. He said to the gentleman from Oklahoma that if that gentleman would reintroduce his resolution it would be presented to the House in the regular way. But the Committee on Printing, up to the present moment, has not had any resolution presented to it, because it has not yet organized. As soon as the resolution comes to it the gentleman was informed that it would be given prompt consideration, although the gentleman from Indiana is only one member of that committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Reserving the right to object, could not the committee take judicial notice of this very great exigency that exists? I know from my own experience in this regard that it is impossible for us to secure these printed regulations anywhere for love or money.

Mr. FERRIS. That is absolutely true.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I have been following this thing up, and find it has been possible to get a few from the superintendent of documents, but he did not have very many, and these are now exhausted, so the only way we can get relief is from the Committee on Printing. I should think that in view of what has recently occurred they would to-day order the printing of a large number of copies of these regulations, in order that not only patriotic organizations but companies already existing may have copies of them.

Mr. BARNHART. The gentleman from Minnesota seems to misunderstand the situation. The Committee on Printing has no authority to order any printing done except reprints.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. They can introduce a resolution.

Mr. BARNHART. It is up to the House to order printing done; but if this resolution is introduced and comes to the Committee on Printing, all the chairman of that committee can say is that it will have very prompt and, I believe, favorable consideration, and will be reported to the House.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. What is there to prevent the gentleman's committee from presenting to the House immediately a resolution coming from the committee?

Mr. BARNHART. The committee has not the necessary data required by law as to the cost of the printing, and so forth.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Neither has any one of us, nor can we get those statistics; but the committee can get them.

Mr. BARNHART. Yes; the committee can get them, and it will if the resolution comes to it. If it is introduced to-day and comes to the committee to-morrow we will consider the resolution and report it promptly, and then if we can get the recognition of the Chair the House can pass it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. With that assurance of the gentleman, I will see that the resolution is put in the basket to-day.

Mr. BARNHART. Very well.

Mr. NORTON. Such resolutions were introduced during the last session, were they not?

Mr. BARNHART. There was one introduced.

Mr. NORTON. It was not favorably reported, was it?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes; it was favorably reported, but we could not get it through because of rush of business in the last hours of the session and difficulties in another branch of the Congress.

Mr. MADDEN. I should like to suggest that when the committee does report such a resolution it provide for sending the documents to the folding room, so that each Member of the House will be able to get some, and not send them to the document room, where one man can get them all.

Mr. BARNHART. Yes; that is always done unless there is a special provision in the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman can put it in proper form in the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

CONFERENCE MINORITY.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of another resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Cleak read as follows:

House resolution 28.

Resolved, That the chairman of the Committee on Conference of Minority be authorized to have such printing and binding done as may be necessary for official business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

supply deficiencies for the fiscal year 1917 and prior years, which bill I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves to suspend the rules and discharge the Committee on Appropriations from further consideration of House bill 12 and pass the same. The Clerk will read it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. With the amendments.

Mr. MANN. If the bill is to pass with amendments, I will ask to have it read as introduced, and then to have the amendments read separately, so that everyone will know what the amendments are.

During the reading of the foregoing,

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOON. Whether under the rule adopted for the passage of these bills it is in order to make a point of order on a section of the bill that contains new law, in violation of the rules of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments offered by the committee:
Page 55, after line 7, insert the following:
"To pay H. Belle Sulloway, daughter of Cyrus Adams Sulloway, late a Representative from the State of New Hampshire, $7,500."

Mr. MANN. As I understand, some gentleman asks unanimous consent that this amendment be considered as a part of the motion.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is correct.

Mr. BORLAND. I move that amendment.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not present it in that way. The gentleman, as I understand, asks unanimous consent that that amendment be incorporated in the bill as a part of the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this amendment be incorporated in the bill as a part of the motion originally made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the amendment just read be incorporated in the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. And the same thing as to the other amendments which will be read?

Mr. MANN. No; they are included in the motion of the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the other amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 57, in line 8, strike out the word "present" and insert the words "Sixty-fourth Congress, second," so that the lines as amended will read:
"For additional compensation to the enrolling clerk of the House of Representatives, in accordance with House resolution No. 501 of the Sixty-fourth Congress, second session, from March 4, 1917, to June 30, 1918, inclusive, $1,325."
Page 57, line 15, strike out the words "March 4, 1917," and insert the words "the passage of this act," so that the lines as amended will read:
"That after the passage of this act the members of the Committee on the District of Columbia,"
On page 57, line 17, strike out the words "who are Members elect of the Sixty-fourth Congress."

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman want to strike out the word "present" in line 18?

Mr. SHERLEY. It is not necessary. It means the same thing.

Mr. MANN. That is true.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. CANNON. I demand a second.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has 20 minutes and the gentleman from Illinois 20 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, this bill is in the identical form in which it passed the House in the last Congress, with the exception of three amendments. The first is on page 55 and provides the usual appropriation for the daughter of the late Representative Sulloway, of New Hampshire. The other two amendments are on page 57, the first in line 8 striking out the words "the present session," which would mean this session, and providing that the payment be made under a resolution of the last session of the Sixty-fourth Congress.

The other amendment is in connection with the authorization of the District of Columbia Committee to continue certain investigation of District accounts. The provision in the bill as passed in the last Congress authorized the members of the District of Columbia Committee of the Sixty-fourth Congress, who were Members-elect of the Sixty-fifth Congress, to continue the investigation, while this amendment authorizes the District Committee which has already been organized to make it.

The bill carries, Mr. Speaker, $62,610,464.81. The importance of passing it speedily is due to the fact that some of the items are imperatively necessary for the various services of the Government. Thirty-eight million dollars of this sum is for the War Department. Many of those who are supplying subsistence for men and animals under contract with the War Department have not received very considerable sums which are and have been due for some time and have been greatly embarrassed because of their inability to obtain the money. Other items of very considerable importance are the amounts to enable the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to continue the work of carrying on the delivery of notes to the Comptroller of the Currency and the Treasurer at the rate necessary in order to permit them to supply the banks with necessary notes to conduct the business of the country.

There are a number of items for the District of Columbia, for the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and for practically all the departments of the Government. It will be necessary, of course, Mr. Speaker, within a very short time to consider estimates for additional deficiencies and to report additional deficiency bills to the House for its consideration. It is believed desirable, however, to pass as quickly as possible this particular bill, so that these sums which are now essential for the proper conduct of the Government shall be made available for the various services immediately. Unless some gentleman desires further information, I will reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], and being somewhat familiar with the bill, being one of the minority members that prepared it originally in the last session of the last Congress, I concur in the statement that the gentleman has made. I believe that the bill ought to be passed, and passed under a suspension of the rules under this motion. I yield such time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] as he may desire.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it is a very unusual procedure to pass a bill under suspension of the rules. I speak now more particularly to the new Members of the House. The appropriations for the running of the Government are very carefully considered in the House of Representatives. Of course, an appropriation act has to go through the Senate, but the real examination of items of appropriations of money is usually made by the House of Representatives, and the House is quite jealous of its prerogatives in this direction; so that it is against the custom of the House to pass appropriations without an opportunity to consider every item in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, where the bill is subject to amendment. There have been a few cases where in the closing days of the Congress the deficiency appropriation bill was passed under suspension of the rules, but it is an unusual practice. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] now moves to suspend the rules and pass this appropriation bill, which is a deficiency bill. In the last Congress this bill passed in identically the same form in which it is proposed to pass it now, with the exception of a verbal amendment or so and the addition of the appropriation for Miss Sulloway. This bill was very carefully considered in the last Congress. It was under consideration for several days. Every item in it was under consideration and a great many of them were under discussion, so that I think that we are warranted now, without waiting to consider the bill in the usual manner, when it would be open to discussion as to the various items and open to amendment, in voting for a suspension of the rules and the passage of the bill, particularly in view of the fact that it was so considered in the prior Congress, and the further fact that these deficiency appropriations ought to be available at the earliest practicable moment. It is not to be understood that by voting for this motion a Member concedes that he is in fact in favor of every item in the bill. There may be some items which Members would like to vote against, but, after all, it is the part of wisdom, it seems to me, for us upon this side of the House to vote for the motion to pass the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, this bill I will say to the House is a deficiency appropriation bill designed to meet expenses which overran the ordinary appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917. By reason of extraordinary circumstances it failed to pass in the last Congress. These items would not have been proposed or reported by the committee or passed by the former Congress if the evidence had not shown they were imperatively needed to round up the work and the duties of the various departments of the Government.

There is one to which I want especially to call attention, and that is the item in regard to the expenses of the Army on the border. Doubtless many of the Members have had requests for information similar to those that have been coming to me, in regard to the supplies that are being furnished or are to be furnished to the Army under various contracts. There was no money to pay for those supplies, and this deficiency bill carries about $38,000,000 altogether for the deficiency of the military branch of the service. Many contractors who were under obligation to furnish supplies, such as hay, oats, and other quartermasters' supplies, found themselves unable to get their warrants, and yet under obligation to continue to furnish the supplies. Additional calls were made upon them under their contracts by the War Department, and their capital was tied up in supplies already furnished and not paid for by the Government. Those bills would have been paid by these appropriations, had they been made at the last session of the last Congress, and will be paid now by these appropriations when they pass the present Congress. I know there have been cases where the whole credit of the contractor is exhausted and the credit of his bank is exhausted in carrying him for the furnishing of supplies to the Government. As the House will readily see, that constitutes a very serious situation in some sections of the country, and with some classes of business men, and especially with a certain branch of the Government this provides as to this particular deficiency bill an extraordinary reason why the House desires promptly to put it through.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. In view of the fact that the gentleman is on the Committee on Appropriations and has information in reference to the cost of maintaining the Army on the border, is he able to tell us what the expedition to Vera Cruz cost the Government, and what the Army and the National Guard has cost us on the border, including the expenses of Gen. Pershing's command that went into Mexico?

Mr. BORLAND. I would not undertake to do that. The items are open to the gentleman.

Mr. AUSTIN. Has the Committee on Appropriations definite information so that the American people can know definitely what the Mexican situation has cost us to date?

Mr. BORLAND. All of the items have passed the House thus far, and they are open to the gentleman.

Mr. AUSTIN. I do not care for all of the items, but I have asked the Committee on Appropriations for a year to tell us how much this Mexican affair has cost us; but up to this good hour I have never received a definite answer.

Mr. BORLAND. I think the gentleman can find it. It is accessible. It is in the RECORD.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does not the gentleman from Tennessee think that perhaps it is the policy of the majority of the committee to cover up those useless and wasteful expenses?

Mr. BORLAND. Let me say to the gentleman that the committee could not cover them up. They are matters of record, and this House has passed upon them all. If I am not mistaken, both the gentleman from Kansas and the gentleman from Tennessee voted for them.

Mr. ANTHONY. They are not itemized at all, and it is absolutely impossible for any Member of this House to tell what the total military expenses of the country have been in the last two years or the last year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, anybody with any industry or any intelligence which ought to be possessed by an ordinary Member of Congress can ascertain that information for himself if he will take the trouble to do so.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman has that information, why does he not give it to us?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have never been asked to give it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not come under the description he has given.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Illinois if I may have a minute or two?

Mr. CANNON. I yield a minute—I yield him two minutes.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I understood the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations upon taking his seat to state that he had never been asked for the information as to how much the Mexican affair had cost us. My recollection is absolutely certain that I have propounded that question to him upon a previous occasion.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, I think the gentleman is under a misapprehension. He may have asked somebody else, but he never asked me.

Mr. AUSTIN. Oh, I will appeal to the RECORD and show it to the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That may be possible.

Mr. AUSTIN. I will ask the gentleman now.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not going to take the time to answer now.

Mr. AUSTIN. The gentleman can answer in my two minutes, and if that is not sufficient I will get an extension from my friend from Illinois.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is not pertinent at this time.

Mr. MANN. He could not state it in four months.

Mr. AUSTIN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] state it correctly in saying that the gentleman could not give it in four months?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] so seldom makes a correct statement that it is idle to attempt to characterize this one.

Mr. AUSTIN. Does not the gentleman recognize that that is information we ought to have regardless of how much time it will consume?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will take a little of my time when I am not busy——

Mr. AUSTIN. But I am glad to yield now to the gentleman from the time which my generous friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has yielded me.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will take a little time when I am not busy with public business from my work which the ordinary Member has to perform, and will gather together all of this information, will take the gentleman from Tennessee apart from the rest, and will give all the time necessary to inform him as to this very important matter.

Mr. AUSTIN. But I desire the gentleman should give the American people the benefit of that information as well as myself. Let us hear it upon the floor of the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman will be able to do that. The gentleman loves to talk.

Mr. AUSTIN. I want to request the chairman of the committee—the proper and authorized head of the great Committee on Appropriations, which receives this information and deals with it in reporting on appropriations—to impart the information to the House and the American people.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Tennessee knows, of course, that the appropriations for the military branches of the Government are not made by the Committee on Appropriations. We merely incidentally supply deficiencies. If the gentleman wants this laborious work undertaken and is not willing to do it himself I suggest that he inquire either of the Committee on Military Affairs or the Committee on Naval Affairs, or both, and not try to make me do everybody's work for his enlightenment.

Mr. AUSTIN. Well, that suggestion is all right, and the gentleman has very generously promised me that he would get that information, and why should I do it when he has so kindly and generously offered to do it for me?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will keep my promise, no matter what the sacrifice will be.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question? If the gentleman does not care to give the details, can the gentleman suggest, in a general way, whether it was a good investment or not?

Mr. FITZGERALD. As to the money invested, whether it was a good investment?

Mr. LITTLE. Whether that was a good investment of the money spent in sending our troops there?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Of course, Mr. Speaker, people look upon investments from various standpoints. Some men with whom I have been slightly acquainted for a brief period in life imagined that when they visited certain cities of the country and invested good money in what is known as gold bricks or green goods they had made a good investment, whereas others——

Mr. MANN. Is not that the case here?

Mr. FITZGERALD. And others when they purchased things of real value imagined they had made a good investment.

Mr. AUSTIN. Was not this a gold-brick investment on the part of the administration?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman does not need any help from the gentleman from Tennessee. Gentlemen must be more specific and not make me indulge in this modern mind reading to determine exactly what they mean by their question. Now, from my standpoint, everything for the dignity, the safety, or the protection of the American people is a good investment, in spite of what anybody else may say. [Applause.] Having finished everyone else, Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, just a word; I think I have a little time remaining. I fancy that it could not be told accurately without much investigation what the various wars that we have had with Mexico in the last year or two did cost from the standpoint of dollars, to say nothing about life, future pensions, and everything else. It can not be told possibly in a decade or two decades. As near as I can get it, and I do not give it from investigation, but I have seen it stated that the cost, as nearly as it can be estimated, of the Mexican situation to the Treasury approximates $160,000,000. But I am not under existing conditions inclined to talk much about the Mexican situation. I do not think you care to talk much about it. That is behind us, and when the clouds roll away and when history is to be written, then the historian will properly criticize the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy and the record of the Democratic Party for the past four years coupled with what its record may be in the coming four years. I have no desire to discuss it now; as I said before, that is behind us and there are serious matters in the present immediate future before us to deal with. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

LEAVE TO SIT DURING SESSIONS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 31.

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations, or such subcommittees as it may designate, shall have leave to sit during sessions of the House during the Sixty-fifth Congress and during the recesses of that Congress.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 4, 1917.

The Senate met at 10 o'clock a. m.

Rev. J. L. Kibler, of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

O God, our heavenly Father, at this time of great concern in our national life, let us understand that we need more and more to lean upon Thy strong arm. We not only need Thee in any conflict that may be forced upon us by a foreign power, but we need Thee at this time in the establishment of policies that shall be fair, and just, and right in the sight of God and man.

Forbid that any selfish or unworthy motive should enter our minds. Though we may be dealing with a Government that seems to ignore our rights and scorn our country's power, yet may we deal in a manner that shall be in harmony with Thy laws and shall win the approbation of our own enlightened consciences.

In the midst of the excited world of to-day, give us calm composure and sober thought. Thy servants upon whom rests the great responsibility of the issues involved need the use of their best thought and unclouded judgment. O God, grant that these men, appointed in Thy providence to serve their country, may act wisely to-day in considering the principles and details of every resolution that may be presented. May they be guarded safely against all errors and reach the highest point of efficiency, so that their conclusions may win the approval of the great Ruler over all the worlds and result in bringing an early and permanent peace, with real blessings, to every nation under the sun. May the Prince of Peace speedily permeate the thought of all mankind. We ask it in the name of Jesus, our Lord and Savior. Amen.

WARREN G. HARDING, a Senator from the State of Ohio, and PARK TRAMMELL, a Senator from the State of Florida, appeared in their seats to-day.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 12) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of the Hon. CYRUS A. SULLOWAY, late a Representative from the State of New Hampshire, and transmitted resolutions of the House thereon.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I present a telegram from Richard M. Faulkner, of Keene, N. H., who, in behalf of the Harvard Club of Keene, strongly urges the immediate passage of a bill for universal military training and service. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I present a telegram embodying a resolution adopted at a meeting of citizens of the State of Washington, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEATTLE, WASH., March 31, 1917.

WASHINGTON DELEGATION IN CONGRESS,
Care Senator Miles Poindexter, Washington, D. C.:

We respectfully submit herewith the following resolution:

"Whereas full page advertisements have appeared in the Seattle papers to-day requesting the people of the West to appeal to President Wilson and the Members of the Sixty-fifth Congress to refrain from any acts of reprisal against the Imperial German Government: Now therefore be it

"Resolved by a mass meeting called in the city of Renton, Wash., March 30, 1917, as follows:

"First. We pledge to the President of the United States and to the Federal Government our united support, the active service of every man of military age, and every dollar of our resources in support of the position taken and to be taken by the United States of America.

"Second. We urge upon the President and upon Congress the early passage of an adequate universal military-training bill.

"Third. We urge upon the President and upon Congress the righteousness of an immediate declaration of war upon the Imperial German Government in protest against the violation of the rights of American citizens upon the high seas.

"Fourth. We urge upon the President and upon Congress the active participation of the armed forces of the United States, both Army and Navy, in aid of the destruction of Prussian militarism.

"Fifth. That a copy hereof should be immediately transmitted to the President of the United States and to the Members of Congress from the State of Washington."

Passed March 30, 1917.

THOMAS DOBSON, Chairman,
PAUL W. HOUSER, Secretary,
Renton, Wash.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to present to the Senate a resolution which I have just received, passed at a mass meeting of citizens of Colorado in the city of Denver on March 31, 1917, and request that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We, citizens of Denver, and others resident in Colorado, in mass meeting assembled on March 31, 1917, make the following declarations:

In the present national crisis we pledge our loyalty in defense of the honor, rights, and just interests of our country, believing that Congress, and the administration will take quick, decisive, efficient, and adequate action to meet all possible emergencies, present and future.

We hold that in the present condition of the world thorough preparedness is necessary to give force to the ideals of human rights and of universal peace for which this country stands. Not only our rights, but our place in the council of nations, our civilization, and our hopes of permanent world peace are at stake, and this country in its united strength should stand ready to enforce its appeals.

Every citizen of a democracy should be prepared and ready at all times to do his part in upholding free institutions and in protecting the country against invasion or aggression of any kind. We therefore urge the immediate enactment of a bill for universal military training, thus providing for a permanent national defense based upon the duty of every able-bodied citizen to share in the protection of his country and in the maintenance of its high ideals.

Acts of the German Government in the present conflict disclose principles of national conduct which are inconsistent with the principles, the purposes, and aspirations of this Republic and of all free peoples. It has committed acts of war against the United States. In violation of the fundamentals of international law and the dictates of humanity it has forbidden us our rights in the use of the high seas, attempted to enforce its edicts by unlawful submarine warfare, destroyed our ships, and murdered our citizens. It would offer a portion of our territory, including a part of the State of Colorado, as a bribe to induce Mexico and Japan to join in war against us. Therefore we declare our deep conviction that the time has come to adopt the most vigorous and comprehensive measures and means for the national defense and the defense of civilization, and we urge upon Congress to give full support to every step that may be taken by the administration to vindicate the national honor and the national right.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I present an article which recently appeared in the Kansas City Star expressing the views of a German-born American, Mr. P. W. Goebel, on the pending question. Mr. Goebel resides in my home city and is a man of the highest character. It would be well for every foreign-born American citizen to carefully study his attitude and to emulate his patriotic example. I desire to have the article printed in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that action will be taken.

The article referred to is as follows:

DUTY FIRST TO THIS COUNTRY—PLEA FOR PATRIOTISM MADE BY P. W. GOEBEL, BORN IN GERMANY.

P. W. Goebel, of the Kansas side, president of the American Bankers' Association, told the Rotary Club at luncheon to-day at the Hotel Baltimore that the United States is better prepared financially for war than any country ever has been in the history of the world.

Mr. Goebel is convinced, after a trip through the East, that the Army and Navy are not in a bad condition. In case of war, he said, this country would be able to handle itself well.

"My interest in the outcome of war," Mr. Goebel said, "is that the honor and dignity of the United States shall be maintained and that the flag of America shall be unstained. I shall give my best brains and financial ability to my adopted country, and my sons will fight to maintain the rights of the American people. That should be the duty of every man in America.

"I was born in Germany. Everything I have I owe to the unrestricted opportunities afforded in America to the man who will work. What I have is at the disposal of my country. Its liberty allowed me to progress, and what I have will be devoted to maintaining that liberty.

"Talking to eastern bankers, I was saddened by their apparent apprehension of the effect war would have on their business. We must all place the Nation's need above our personal and business interests."

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 14) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; and

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 15) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; to the Committee on Woman Suffrage.

By Mr. SMOOT:

NATURALIZATION OF ALIENS.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I present several bills for reading and reference, but I wish to call attention to one in particular. I am informed that there are in this country thousands of German aliens who have neglected through carelessness to take out their naturalization papers, although they have been in the United States many years. They have been and are law-abiding residents of our country, but at this time they realize, as they have never realized before, that they have neglected the opportunity which has been accorded them to become citizens of a country which they love and with which their highest welfare is aligned. They are now recorded or will be recorded as aliens, and the finger of suspicion will be pointed at them. I am advised that they are very anxious to become citizens of the United States at once.

I introduce this bill providing for naturalizing those citizens, without making the declaration of intentions, who comply with the law of the land in regard to naturalization in other respects and who have been here for five years or more. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Immigration.

The bill (S. 124) to provide for the naturalization of certain aliens was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Immigration.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I introduce a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States conferring upon women the right of suffrage. This joint resolution is identical with one introduced in several previous Congresses and generally known as the Susan B. Anthony amendment. I have been requested by the National American Woman Suffrage Association and others to introduce this joint resolution in such order as would cause it to bear number "1" as in previous Congresses. I had planned this course, but the exigencies of this extraordinary session of Congress have not made this purpose practicable or advisable, owing to the tremendous importance of the joint resolution introduced on Monday night. I know that the supporters of this joint resolution are quite willing that it shall bear a subsequent number. I therefore introduce the joint resolution and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Woman Suffrage.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 2) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States conferring upon women the right of suffrage was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Woman Suffrage.

NATIONAL PROHIBITION.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I introduce a joint resolution, which I ask may be read at length. It is short.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 17) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following amendment to the Constitution be, and hereby is, proposed to the States, to become valid as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of the several States as provided by the Constitution:

"ARTICLE —.

"SECTION 1. The manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, and the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes are hereby prohibited.

"SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation, and nothing in this article shall deprive the several States of their power to enact and enforce laws prohibiting the traffic in intoxicating liquors."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENTS TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. JONES of Washington submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $4,000 to pay John W. Keener for compiling and indexing the Public Land Statutes of the United States, printed as Senate document No. 547, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill (H. R. 12), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HUGHES submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,200 to pay Dennis M. Kerr for extra and expert services rendered to the Committee on Pensions during the second session of the Sixty-fourth Congress, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill (H. R. 12), which was referred to the Committee on Pensions and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. HUGHES. I desire to give notice that on to-morrow I shall submit a proposed amendment to the rules of the Senate, to read as follows:

I hereby give notice of intention to propose an amendment to the rules of the Senate, as follows:

"Resolved, That after a bill or joint resolution shall have been reported to the Senate from the Committee of the Whole no Senator shall, without unanimous consent, speak for more than one hour on the bill nor for more than 10 minutes on any amendment, and that all such debate shall be pertinent and relevant to the subject under discussion."

FEDERAL ANTITRUST DECISIONS.

Mr. McLEAN submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 1), which was read and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound 3,000 copies of the Federal antitrust decisions, 1911 to 1917, to be compiled by the direction of the Department of Justice, 1,000 copies for the use of the Senate and 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

ALICE CANNING.

Mr. HUGHES submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 22), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, to Alice Canning, widow of Thomas A. Canning, late conductor of elevator in the employ of the United States Senate, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

WASHINGTON RAILWAY & ELECTRIC CO.

Mr. HUGHES submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 23), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Whereas differences have arisen between the Washington Railway & Electric Co. (a street railway corporation in the District of Columbia, created and existing by virtue of the act of Congress approved June 5, 1900) and certain of its employees, by reason of which said employees declared a strike or "walkout" on Monday, March 12, 1917, and withdrew from the service if the company; and

Whereas the failure of the said street railway company and its employees to settle and adjust their differences has caused and is causing great public inconvenience and loss; and

Whereas it is in the interest of the public safety and welfare that the causes of the existing differences between the Washington Railway & Electric Co. and its employees should be ascertained and a means devised, if possible, whereby the same may be justly accommodated: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be appointed by the Presiding Officer of the Senate, who are hereby given full authority to investigate the cause or causes which have occasioned the present strike by the said employees of the Washington Railway & Electric Co. and to report the result of its investigations, with such recommendations as it may deem proper to make, to the Senate at the earliest possible day, and the said committee or subcommittee thereof is hereby given power and authority to summon witnesses, administer oaths, and take testimony under oath as to all matters and things covered by this resolution and to employ such clerical and stenographic assistance as may be necessary in the premises, the expenses of said committee to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. OWEN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 24), which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That Rules I, III, IV, V, VI, VII, VIII, IX, X, XII, XVI, XVIII, XIX, XX, XXII, XXVIII, XXIX, XXXVI, and XL be amended to read as follows:

(Jefferson's Manual, Sec. IX.)

That whenever a Senator shall be designated by the President pro tempore to perform the duties of the Chair during his temporary absence he shall be empowered to sign, as acting President pro tempore, the enrolled bills and joint resolutions coming from the House of Representatives for presentation to the President of the United States.

"A Senator occupying the chair temporarily in the absence of those presiding officers who may occupy it under the rule is authorized to sign bills and joint resolutions as set forth in this clause.

"RULE III.

"COMMENCEMENT OF DAILY SESSIONS.

"First. The Presiding Officer having taken the chair, and a quorum being present, the Journal of the preceding day shall be read, and any mistake made in the entries corrected. The reading of the Journal shall not be suspended unless by unanimous consent, and when any motion shall be made to amend or correct the same it shall be deemed a privileged question and proceeded with until disposed of. (Jefferson's Manual, Secs. VI, XLIX.)

(Jefferson's Manual, Sec. XLIX.)

"Second. The legislative, the executive, the confidential legislative proceedings, and the proceedings when sitting as a Court of Impeachment shall each be recorded in a separate book. (Jefferson's Manual, Sec. XLIX.)

"RULE V.

"QUORUM—ABSENT SENATORS MAY BE SENT FOR.

"First. No Senator shall absent himself from the service of the Senate without leave. (Jefferson's Manual, Sec. VIII.)

"Second. If, at any time during the daily sessions of the Senate, a question shall be raised by any Senator as to the presence of a quorum, the presiding officer shall forthwith direct the Secretary to call the roll and shall announce the result, and these proceedings shall be without debate, but a second call for a quorum shall not be had until business, other than debate, has been presented or has intervened. A Senator shall not be required to yield the floor to another Senator for the purpose of suggesting the absence of a quorum without his consent.

"Third. Whenever upon such roll call it shall be ascertained that a quorum is not present, a majority of the Senators present may direct the Sergeant at Arms to request and, when necessary, to compel the attendance of the absent Senators, by issuing a warrant signed by the temporary occupant of the chair in the absence of the Vice President, the President pro tempore, or the Senator designated to preside during the day by the foregoing officers, and who is also hereby authorized to sign said warrant, which shall be attested by the Secretary with the seal of the Senate attached, which order shall be determined without debate; and pending its execution, and until a quorum shall be present, no debate nor motion, except to adjourn, shall be in order. The same powers are given to the majority of Senators present to request and, when necessary, to compel the attendance of absent Senators when a quorum is present, without debate.

"Fourth. If necessary, when a Senator is present, even if paired, and does not answer to the roll call, he shall be counted as present to make a quorum.

"RULE VI.

"PRESENTATION OF CREDENTIALS.

"First. The presentation of the credentials of Senators elect or appointed and other questions of privilege shall always be in order, except during the reading and correction of the Journal, while a question of order or a motion to adjourn is pending, or while the Senate is dividing; and all questions and motions arising or made upon the presentation of such credentials shall be proceeded with until disposed of.

"Second. The Secretary shall keep a record of the certificates of election or appointment of Senators by entering in a well-bound book kept for that purpose the date of the election, the name of the person elected and the vote given at the election, the date of the certificate, the name of the governor and the secretary of state signing and countersigning the same, and the State from which such Senator is elected.

"RULE VII.

"MORNING BUSINESS.

"First. After the Journal is read the Presiding Officer shall lay before the Senate messages from the President, reports and communications from the heads of departments, and other communications addressed to the Senate, and such bills, joint resolutions, and other messages from the House of Representatives as may remain upon his table from any previous day's session undisposed of. The Presiding Officer shall then call for, in the following order:

"The presentation of petitions and memorials.

"Reports of standing and select committees.

"The introduction of bills and joint resolutions.

"Concurrent and other resolutions.

"Resolutions coming over from a previous day.

"All of which shall be received and disposed of in such order, unless unanimous consent shall be otherwise given, except resolutions coming over from a previous day, which may be considered until disposed of on that day or until the expiration of the morning hour, and if not disposed of shall go to the calendar.

"Second. Senators having petitions, memorials, or bills during or after the morning hour may deliver them to the Secretary of the Senate, indorsing upon them their names and the reference or disposition to be made thereof, and said petitions, memorials, and bills shall, with the approval of the Presiding Officer, be entered on the Journal with the names of the Senators presenting them as having been read twice and referred to the appropriate committees; and the Secretary of the Senate shall furnish a transcript of such entries to the official reporter of debates for publication in the RECORD.

"It shall not be in order to interrupt a Senator having the floor for the purpose of introducing any memorial, petition, report of a committee, resolution or bill. It shall be the duty of the Chair to enforce this rule without any point of order hereunder being made by a Senator.

"Third. Until the morning business shall have been concluded and so announced from the Chair, which may be before the hour of 1 o'clock, but if not concluded until the hour of 1 o'clock has arrived no motion to proceed to the consideration of any bill, resolution, report of a committee, or other subject upon the calendar shall be entertained by the Presiding Officer unless by unanimous consent; and if such consent be given the motion shall not be subject to amendment, and shall be decided without debate upon the merits of the subject proposed to be taken up. (Jefferson's Manual, Sec. XIV.)

"Fourth. Every petition or memorial shall be referred without putting the question unless objection to such reference is made, in which case all motions for the reception or reference of such petition, memorial, or other paper shall be put in the order in which the same shall be made, and shall not be open to amendment except to add instructions. (Jefferson's Manual, Sec. XIX.)

"Fifth. Every petition or memorial shall be signed by the petitioner or memorialist and have indorsed thereon a brief statement of its contents, and shall be presented and referred without debate. But no petition or memorial or other paper signed by citizens or subjects of a foreign power shall be received unless the same be transmitted to the Senate by the President. (Jefferson's Manual, Sec. XIX.)

"Sixth. That when petitions and memorials are ordered printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the order shall be deemed to apply to the body of the petition only, and the names attached to said petition or memorial shall not be printed unless specially ordered by the Senate.

"Seventh. The presiding officer may at any time lay, and it shall be in order at any time for a Senator to move to lay, before the Senate any bill or other matter sent to the Senate by the President or the House of Representatives, and any question pending at that time shall be suspended for this purpose. Any motion so made shall be determined without debate. (Jefferson's Manual, Sec. XIV.)

"RULE VIII.

"ORDER OF BUSINESS.

"At the conclusion of the morning business for each day, unless upon motion the Senate shall at any time otherwise order, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the Calendar of Bills and Resolutions and continue such consideration until 2 o'clock; and bills and resolutions that are not objected to shall be taken up in their order, and each Senator shall be entitled to speak once and for five minutes only upon any question; and the objection may be interposed at any stage of the proceedings, but upon motion the Senate may continue such consideration; and this order shall commence immediately after the call for 'concurrent and other resolutions' and shall take precedence of the unfinished business and other special orders. But if the Senate shall proceed with the consideration of any matter notwithstanding an objection, the foregoing provisions touching debate shall not apply. (Jefferson's Manual, Sec. XIV.)

"Unless otherwise ordered, the morning hour shall terminate at the expiration of two hours after the meeting of the Senate.

"All motions made before 2 o'clock to proceed to the consideration of any matter shall be determined without debate. (Jefferson's Manual, Sec. XIV.)

"RULE IX.

"Immediately after the consideration of cases not objected to upon the calendar is completed, and not later than 2 o'clock, if there shall be no special orders for that time, the Calendar of General Orders shall be taken up and proceeded with in its order, beginning with the first subject on the calendar which has been objected to in proceeding with the calendar; and in such case the following motions shall be in order at any time as privileged motions, save as against a motion to adjourn, or to proceed to the consideration of executive business, or questions of privilege, to wit:

"First. A motion to proceed to the consideration of an appropriation or revenue bill.

"Second. A motion to proceed to the consideration of any other bill on the calendar, which motion shall not be open to amendment.

"Third. A motion to pass over the pending subject, which, if carried, shall have the effect to leave such subject without prejudice in its place on the calendar.

"Fourth. A motion to place such subject at the foot of the calendar.

"Each of the foregoing motions shall be decided without debate and shall have precedence in the order above named, and may be submitted as in the nature and with all the rights of questions of order. (Jefferson's Manual, Secs. XIV, XXXIII.)

"RULE X.

"SPECIAL ORDERS.

"First. Any subject may, by a vote of a majority of the Senators present, be made a special order; and when the time so fixed for its consideration arrives the Presiding Officer shall lay it before the Senate, unless there be unfinished business of the preceding day, and if it is not finally disposed of on that day it shall take its place on the Calendar of Special Orders in the order of time at which it was made special, and shall, at 1 o'clock each day, be laid before the Senate until disposed of, unless it shall become by adjournment the unfinished business. (Jefferson's Manual, Secs. XVIII, XXXIII.)

"Second. When two or more special orders have been made for the same time, they shall have precedence according to the order in which they were severally assigned, and that order shall only be changed by direction of the Senate.

"And all motions to change such order, or to proceed to the consideration of other business, shall be decided without debate. (Jefferson's Manual, Secs. XVIII, XXXIII.)

"RULE XII.

"VOTING, ETC.

"First. When the yeas and nays are ordered, the names of Senators shall be called alphabetically; and each Senator shall, without debate, declare his assent or dissent to the question, unless excused by the Senate; and no Senator shall be permitted to vote after the decision shall have been announced by the Presiding Officer, but may for sufficient reasons, after the roll call and before announcement of the result, with unanimous consent, change or withdraw his vote. No motion to suspend this rule shall be in order, nor shall the presiding officer entertain any request to suspend it by unanimous consent. (Jefferson's Manual, Sec. XLI.)

"Second. When a Senator declines to vote on call of his name he shall be required to assign his reasons therefor, and, having assigned them, the Presiding Officer shall submit the question to the Senate: 'Shall the Senator, for the reasons assigned by him, be excused from voting?' which shall be decided without debate; and these proceedings shall be had after the roll call and before the result is announced; and any further proceedings in reference thereto shall be after such announcement. (Jefferson's Manual, Secs. XVII, XLI.)

"Third. No request by a Senator for unanimous consent for the taking of a final vote on a specified date upon the passage of a bill or joint resolution shall be submitted to the Senate for agreement thereto until, upon a roll call ordered for the purpose by the Presiding Officer, it shall be disclosed that a quorum of the Senate is present; and when a unanimous consent is thus given the same shall operate as the order of the Senate, but any unanimous consent may be revoked by another unanimous consent granted in the manner prescribed above upon one day's notice.

"RULE XVI.

"AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

"First. All general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, except the following bills, which shall be severally referred as herein indicated, namely: The bill making appropriations for rivers and harbors, to the Committee on Commerce; the Agricultural bill, to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry; the Army and the Military Academy bills, to the Committee on Military Affairs; the Indian bill, to the Committee on Indian Affairs; the naval bill, to the Committee on Naval Affairs; the pension bill, to the Committee on Pensions; the Post Office bill, to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads; and no amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or treaty stipulation, or act, or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session, or unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate or proposed in pursuance of an estimate of the head of some one of the departments. (Jefferson's Manual, Sec. XXXV.)

"Second. All amendments to general appropriation bills moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, proposing to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill or to add new items of appropriation, shall, at least one day before they are considered, be referred to the committee having jurisdiction thereof, and when actually proposed to the bill no amendment proposing to increase the amount stated in such amendment shall be received; in like manner amendments proposing new items of appropriation to river and harbor bills shall before being considered be referred to the Committee on Commerce. (Jefferson's Manual, Sec. XXXV.)

"Third. No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill, nor shall any amendment not germane or relevant to the subject matter contained in the bill be received; nor shall any amendment to any item or clause of such bill be received which does not directly relate thereto; and all questions of relevancy of amendments under this rule, when raised, shall be submitted to the Senate and be decided without debate; and any amendment to a general appropriation bill may be laid on the table without prejudice to the bill. (Jefferson's Manual, Sec. XXXV.)

"Fourth. No amendment the object of which is to provide for a private claim shall be received to any general appropriation bill, unless it be to carry out the provisions of an existing law or a treaty stipulation, which shall be cited on the face of the amendment. (Jefferson's Manual, Sec. XXXV.)

"RULE XVIII.

"AMENDMENTS—DIVISION OF A QUESTION.

"If the question in debate contains several propositions, any Senator may have the same divided, except a motion to strike out and insert, which shall not be divided; but the rejection of a motion to strike out and insert one proposition shall not prevent a motion to strike out and insert a different proposition; nor shall it prevent a motion simply to strike out; nor shall the rejection of a motion to strike out prevent a motion to strike out and insert. But pending a motion to strike out and insert, the part to be stricken out and the part to be inserted shall each be regarded for the purpose of amendment as an original question and not an amendment in the first degree; and motions to amend the part to be stricken out shall have precedence. (Jefferson's Manual, Secs. XXXV, XXXVI.)

"RULE XIX.

"DEBATE.

"First. When a Senator desires to speak he shall rise and address the Presiding Officer, and shall not proceed until he is recognized, and the Presiding Officer shall recognize the Senator who shall first address him. No Senator shall interrupt another Senator in debate without his consent, except for a question, unless by unanimous consent, and to obtain such consent he shall first address the Presiding Officer; and no Senator shall speak more than twice nor for more than one hour upon any one question in debate on the same day without leave of the Senate, which shall be determined without debate. (Jefferson's Manual, Secs. XVII, XXXIX.)

"Second. No Senator in debate shall, directly or indirectly, by any form of words impute to another Senator or to other Senators any conduct or motive unworthy or unbecoming a Senator. (Jefferson's Manual, Sec. XVII.)

"Third. No Senator in debate shall refer offensively to any State of the Union.

"Fourth. If any Senator, in speaking or otherwise, transgress the rules of the Senate, the Presiding Officer shall, or any Senator may, call him to order; and when a Senator shall be called to order he shall sit down and not proceed without leave of the Senate, which, if granted, shall be upon motion that he be allowed to proceed in order, which motion shall be determined without debate. (Jefferson's Manual, Sec. XVII.)

"Fifth. If a Senator be called to order for words spoken in debate, upon the demand of the Senator or of any other Senator, the exceptionable words shall be taken down in writing and read at the table for the information of the Senate. (Jefferson's Manual, Sec. XVII.)

"Sixth. Whenever confusion arises in the Chamber or the galleries, or demonstrations of approval or disapproval are indulged in by the occupants of the galleries, it shall be the duty of the Chair to enforce order on his own initiative and without any point of order being made by a Senator.

"RULE XX.

"QUESTIONS OF ORDER.

"First. A question of order may be raised at any stage of the proceedings, except when the Senate is dividing, and, unless submitted to the Senate, shall be decided by the presiding officer without debate, subject to an appeal to the Senate. The Chair may permit debate for his own information, and each Senator may be entitled to speak once and for not exceeding five minutes on the question of order until the presiding officer announces that he is ready to rule on the point of order. When an appeal is taken, any subsequent question of order which may arise before the decision of such appeal shall be decided by the Presiding Officer without debate; and every appeal therefrom shall be decided at once, and without debate; and any appeal may be laid on the table without prejudice to the pending proposition, and thereupon shall be held as affirming the decision of the Presiding Officer. (Jefferson's Manual, Sec. XXXIII.)

"Second. The Presiding Officer may submit any quqestion of order for the decision of the Senate. (Jefferson's Manual, Sec. XXXIII.)

"RULE XXII.

"PRECEDENCE OF MOTIONS.

"When a question is pending, no motion shall be received but—

"To adjourn.

"To adjourn to a day certain, or that when the Senate adjourn it shall be to a day certain.

"To take a recess.

"To proceed to the consideration of executive business.

"To lay on the table.

"To postpone indefinitely.

"To postpone to a day certain.

"To commit.

"To amend.

Which several motions shall have precedence as they stand arranged; and the motions relating to adjournment, to take a recess, to proceed to the consideration of executive business, to lay on the table, shall be decided without debate. (Jefferson's Manual, Sec. XXXIII.)

"Provided, however, That any Senator may move that the debate should be brought to a close, the Chair shall, without permitting any debate thereon, put the question to the Senate—

"'Is it the sense of the Senate that the debate should be brought to a close?'

"And if that question shall be decided in the affirmative, then it shall be in order to the exclusion of all other questions and business for any Senator to move to limit debate on the pending bill or resolution and all amendments thereto, and the said motion shall be decided without debate. And thereafter, the motion being carried, no Senator shall be entitled to speak more than one hour in all on the bill, the amendments thereto, and any motion affecting the same.

"No dilatory motion shall be in order, and it shall be the duty of the Presiding Officer to declare such motion out of order when the question of order is raised by a Senator, or to immediately submit the question without debate to the Senate.

"RULE XXVIII.

"MESSAGES AND EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

"First. Messages from the President of the United States or from the House of Representatives may be received at any stage of proceedings, except while the Senate is dividing, or while the Journal is being read, or while a question of order or a motion to adjourn is pending. (Jefferson's Manual, Sec. XLVII.)

"Second. Messages shall be sent to the House of Representatives by the Secretary, who shall previously certify the determination of the Senate upon all bills, joint resolutions, and other resolutions which may be communicated to the House, or in which its concurrence may be requested; and the Secretary shall also certify and deliver to the President of the United States all resolutions and other communications which may be directed to him by the Senate. (Jefferson's Manual, Sec. XLVII.)

"No communications from heads of departments, commissioners, chiefs of bureaus, or other executive officers, except when authorized or required by law, or when made in response to a resolution of the Senate, will be received by the Senate unless such communications shall be transmitted to the Senate by the President.

"RULE XXIX.

"PRINTING OF PAPERS, ETC.

"First. Every motion to print documents, reports, and other matter transmitted by either of the executive departments, or to print memorials, petitions, accompanying documents, or any other paper, except bills of the Senate or House of Representatives, resolutions submitted by a Senator, communications from the legislatures or conventions, lawfully called, of the respective States, and motions to print by order of the standing or select committees of the Senate, shall, unless the Senate otherwise order, be referred to the Committee on Printing. When a motion is made to commit with instructions it shall be in order to add thereto a motion to print.

"Second. Motions to print additional numbers shall also be referred to the Committee on Printing; and when the committee shall report favorably the report shall be accompanied by an estimate of the probable cost thereof; and when the cost of printing such additional numbers shall exceed the sum of $500 the concurrence of the House of Representatives shall be necessary for an order to print the same.

"RULE XXXVI.

"EXECUTIVE SESSIONS.

"First. When the President of the United States shall meet the Senate in the Senate Chamber for the consideration of executive business, he shall have a seat on the right of the Presiding Officer. When the Senate shall be convened by the President of the United States to any other place, the Presiding Officer of the Senate and the Senators shall attend at the place appointed, with the necessary officers of the Senate.

"Second. When acting upon confidential or executive business, unless the same shall be considered in open executive session, the Senate Chamber shall be cleared of all persons except the Secretary, the Chief Clerk, the Principal Legislative Clerk, the Executive Clerk, the minute and Journal clerk, the Sergeant at Arms, the Assistant Doorkeeper, and such other officers as the Presiding Officer shall think necessary; and all such officers shall be sworn to secrecy.

"Third. All confidential communications made by the President of the United States to the Senate shall be by the Senators and the officers of the Senate kept secret; and all treaties which may be laid before the Senate, and all remarks, votes, and proceedings thereon shall also be kept secret, until the Senate shall, by their resolution, take off the injunction of secrecy, or unless the same shall be considered in open executive session.

"The injunction of secrecy is extended to each step in the consideration of treaties, including the fact of ratification. (Senate Journal, p. 571. Appendix.)

"Fourth. Whenever the injunction of secrecy shall be removed from any part of the proceedings of the Senate in executive session, or secret legislative session, the order of the Senate removing the same shall be entered by the Secretary of the Legislative Journal as well as in the executive journal, and shall be published in the RECORD. (Jefferson's Manual, Sec. LII.)

"RULE XL.

"SUSPENSION AND AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

"No motion to suspend, modify, or amend any rule, or any part thereof, shall be in order, except on one-day's notice, in writing, specifying precisely the rule or part proposed to be suspended, modified, or amended, and the purpose thereof. Any rule may be suspended without notice by the unanimous consent of the Senate, except as otherwise provided in clause 1, Rule XII, or by a two-thirds vote, without debate."

WAR WITH GERMANY.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 1.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and lays before the Senate the joint resolution.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 1) declaring that a state of war exists between the Imperial German Government and the Government and the people of the United States and making provision to prosecute the same, which had been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The amendment is, on page 1, line 7, after the words "directed to," to strike out the words "take immediate steps not only to put the country in a thorough state of defense, but also to exert all of its power and employ all of its resources to carry on war against the Imperial German Government and to bring the conflict to a successful termination," and insert "employ the entire naval and military forces of the United States and the resources of the Government to carry on war against the Imperial German Government; and to bring the conflict to a successful termination all of the resources of the country are hereby pledged by the Congress of the United States," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the state of war between the United States and the Imperial German Government which has thus been thrust upon the United States is hereby formally declared; and that the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to employ the entire naval and military forces of the United States and the resources of the Government to carry on war against the Imperial German Government; and to bring the conflict to a successful determination all of the resources of the country are hereby pledged by the Congress of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, what I shall say in support of the joint resolution will be short. The time for action has arrived. The time for discussion has passed. The President of the United States has already stated more clearly, more conclusively, and more effectively than I can the reasons which make this great step now to be taken necessary.

The joint resolution provides for war against the Imperial German Government. It is framed on the lines of other war declarations of Congress, in that it directs the President to employ the military and naval forces of the country to carry the war to a successful termination. It also conforms to the precedents of other declarations when Congress has entered upon the solemn business of war by declaring that a state of war already exists. It places the responsibility of this war squarely upon the shoulders of the Imperial German Government, which is charged with having committed repeated acts of war against the United States. Over and above all this, however, the measure is unquestionably also a declaration of war.

Mr. President, in presenting the joint resolution I am impressed with the solemnity of the occasion. Some may be filled with joy at the prospect of war. To me it is depressing and dreadful. The enormous cost which the people must pay, the great increased cost of living which they must meet, the enormous burden of taxes which they must bear, and the still greater heritage of debt which they must incur stagger my mind. The awful sacrifice of life that must follow sickens my heart. I am sure other Senators have the same feeling. I am sure the great body of the American people have it also.

Our country has nothing material to gain by victory. We want no more territory; we demand no indemnity. We have no historic grudges to settle and no racial antipathies to gratify.

In these respects, Mr. President, we differ from other countries already involved in this awful struggle. Pan-Slavism struggles with pan-Germanism. Italy fights to get back the Trentino. France is resolved to recover her lost provinces. Great Britain has almost within her grasp German commerce and German colonies. Russia fights to win Constantinople. Germany not only wants her place in the sun but she wants to dominate central Europe, while Austria, Bulgaria, and Roumania all seek to extend their borders.

We alone of all the nations, Mr. President, will spend our treasure and sacrifice our lives without possibility of material gain. We are going to war, Mr. President, to vindicate our honor and to maintain our independence as a great nation. We are going to war, as the President has stated, in defense of humanity. Such quarrel as we have with the Imperial Government of Germany was not of our seeking. It was forced upon us. We did much to avoid it.

For nearly three years of this struggle our country has steadily held to its purpose to avoid war if possible. This has been true not only of the President but of Congress; and it has been true of the American people. One desperate act of the Imperial German Government after another has added to the provocation. I do not mean to say, Mr. President, that Germany has desired war with us; I do not believe it; but the German Government has been desperate and has taken desperate chances.

The invasion of Belgium shocked the sense of justice of the whole civilized world and subjected American neutrality to its first great strain. The sinking of the Lusitania, with hundreds of innocent passengers, men, women, and children, many of them Americans, sent a thrill of horror through America, and would have produced war had it not been for the moderation of President Wilson and his success finally in securing from the German Government an agreement to modify its methods and conform them to the rules of international law and to the dictates of humanity.

It is customary, Mr. President, to say that this agreement was violated by Germany, but it is more just and more correct to say that Germany had reserved the right to revoke it under certain conditions and exercised that right by revoking it on February first of this year. This also was an act of desperation. It was not intended to provoke war with us, but it was followed by acts of war upon us. They were not made for the deliberate purpose of injuring us, but rather to starve the English people. The effect on us, however, was the same. We were ordered off the high seas. We then dissolved diplomatic relations with Germany. We might then have gone to war. We could not submit; no great nation could remain great and independent if it did so. No great nation could maintain its place in history if it permitted another to order it off the seas; if it permitted another to bottle up its commerce; if it permitted another to dictate to it as to the exercise of its unquestioned right and to impose the penalty of murder of its citizens in case of refusal.

The President stated in his address that we were confronted with the alternative of resistance or submission; and, Mr. President, we should remember that even then this people did not declare for war and our great President did not recommend war. He proposed the only other alternative there was, and recommended to Congress that this country assume a position of armed neutrality, so that it might assert and defend upon the high seas its rights and the privileges of its people without actually going to war. When the President made that recommendation a little more than a month ago the country received it practically with unanimity; Congress received it practically with unanimity. The resolution authorizing it passed the House of Representatives almost unanimously. That resolution would have passed the Senate by an overwhelming vote if it had not been for a filibuster in the closing days of the session, which made it impossible for nine-tenths of the Senate to cast the vote that it was ready to cast in support of the President's position. Nevertheless as far as he could the President placed the country in a position of armed neutrality. So the people of the country, the Congress of the country, and the President of the country have taken one step after another, have adopted one policy after another, in the hope of avoiding this terrible last alternative with which we are now confronted.

Mr. President, I think that armed neutrality might have succeeded. I thought when I stood here and advocated the armed neutrality bill that if Congress with practical unanimity stood behind the President in authorizing armed neutrality, Germany might yield. Germany might have seen that the position of the United States was definite and unmistakable as well as honorable, and Germany might have ceased to continue the invasion of our rights upon the high seas. Unfortunately, however, the opposition raised to that measure, the filibuster successfully conducted upon the floor of the Senate, resulted in a technical refusal of Congress to adopt the President's recommendation. It went out to the world officially that the different branches of the United States Government were at loggerheads. The result has been that our neutral rights have been more imposed upon since that time than they were before. Five or six, possibly seven, American vessels upon innocent errands of commerce upon the high seas have been sunk. Some of them were not even upon the way to a belligerent port, but were returning to the United States in ballast, and in three of the cases at least the lives of American citizens have been lost. Nearly a hundred lives of Americans have been lost since we stood here a month ago discussing armed neutrality, and the time has passed, unfortunately, when we can longer consider armed neutrality as an expedient short of war.

The American people, Mr. President, have clung to the hope through all these months that the dread alternative might be avoided. Like the Savior of man in the garden of Gethsemane, they have prayed that the bitter cup of sacrifice might pass from them. They have prayed that it might not be necessary to make the sacrifice for the protection of humanity and the vindication of national honor. All has been in vain. All patience, all moderation, and all long-suffering have apparently been in vain—not entirely in vain, though, Mr. President, because we have avoided the horrors of war for two years or more; but the time has now come when further delay is impossible.

Mr. President, I have opposed war; I have been bitterly opposed to it. What influence I have had in my State and in this body has been exerted against it. As long as there was any hope to avoid it I used my legitimate influence for that purpose. I supported armed neutrality here with the fervor that I did because I thought it offered an escape from war with honor, and I even hoped to avoid war up to the eleventh hour. Yes, Mr. President, when I knew that the people of the United States were calling for war, when I knew that a majority of the Congress of the United States was overwhelmingly for war, and upon the proper occasion would vote for war—even when I knew that, Mr. President, I sought out the President of the United States and begged him if possible to cling yet longer to armed neutrality as an expedient to avoid war; but it was vain. The President was in possession of such information as made it impossible for him to listen longer to the arguments of those who sought to avoid war. He has spoken to the Congress. The country is ready, and the Congress is ready. While the vote has not yet been recorded, the decision has, as we all know, been reached. It is war.

I can not at this moment cast my vote against war without doing a vain and foolish thing. My act would only serve to weaken my country in the face of the enemy and in the face of inevitable war. Therefore, Mr. President, I have obeyed the instructions of the Committee on Foreign Relations and made this report to the Senate, and I am now ready to take my place with those who will back to the utmost the President of the United States in prosecuting this war for the honor of the country and in the interest of humanity.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, the President of the United States in an address to Congress has forcibly recited the many grievances which we have against the Imperial Government of Germany, the many outrages perpetrated upon our citizens by that Government, and its many affronts to our flag and sovereignty. He has shown that the German Government has repeatedly and grossly violated its treaty obligations to us and wantonly broken most solemn assurances given our Government to respect our international rights. He has proven that, by the lawless destruction of ships bearing and claiming the protection of our flag, without notice and without provocation, by German submarines acting under positive directions from the German Government, that Government has proceeded to wage war upon this Nation. He asks authority from Congress to use the Army and Navy to defend our rights, protect our citizens and their legitimate commerce, and to give him the means efficiently to wage this war violently precipitated by Germany.

The question presented to us for determination is whether we shall promptly and generously respond to the brave and patriotic appeal of the President to defend our rights and redress our wrongs, or whether we shall cowardly submit to these and further outrages, and through craven fear relinquish important rights which are vital to us as a great and aspiring Nation. The issue is not peace or war. War has already been wantonly and lawlessly prosecuted against us. The issue is whether we shall accept war or abject and cowardly submission. Before the recent outrages, had we not already submitted at the hands of the Imperial Government of Germany to all that could be expected of a brave and self-respecting people? Have we not seen since the beginning of this war German officials in the United States engaged in many improper activities in violation of the laws of the United States and of their obligations as officials in a neutral country? Has it not been proven beyond contradiction that the military and naval attachés of the German Embassy in this country by their many and varied activities sought to use this country as a base for military operations against nations with which we were at peace? The Federal authorities have clearly proven that a scheme was financed and directed from this country to incite a rebellion in India against the British Government, with which we are upon terms of peace and amity. Have not officers of interned German warships violated their word of honor and escaped? German officials duly accredited to his Government have been detected in issuing fraudulent passports to enable spies to enter and operate in foreign countries at peace with us. American passports, fraudulent and counterfeited, have been found on German agents. Persons have been tried and convicted and sentenced in this country for using our territory as a base for providing German warships with coal and other supplies, in violation of the statutes of the United States and our neutrality.

It has been disclosed that our territory has been used by German officials to organize efforts to wreck bridges and destroy important industries in Canada, our northern neighbor. Bombs have been prepared and sought to be placed upon allied ships lying in our harbors. German officials, in violation of our laws, have sought to control the employment in the munitions industries, and thus cripple or destroy these. For several years we have known of German activities in Mexico prejudicial to our interests and seeking to embroil us in trouble with that distracted country. The extent and dangerous character of these activities, though suspected, were not fully known until the recent publication of the Zimmermann letter, which proved the efforts being made in Mexico by the German Government to incite that nation to war against us. This letter reached the lowest depths of national turpitude. The German ambassador, while enjoying our hospitality, was informed of a contemplated breaking of a solemn assurance which he himself had given to our Government, promising to respect our international rights upon the sea, and was told that if we did not tamely submit to this broken pledge and gross invasion of our rights, then he should endeavor to combine Mexico and Japan with Germany in warfare against the United States, pledging the German Government to despoil us of Texas, Arizona, and New Mexico, which should be given to Mexico. The absurdity of the scheme does not lessen its shameless enormity. The fact that the wicked proposal fell upon unwilling ears does not lessen our belief in the willingness of the German Government, when opportunity presents, to do us serious mischief and harm. This note could not have been suddenly precipitated without previous careful consideration and possibly prior intrigue. Large national interests and combinations are not thus hastily determined.

We have long suspected a disposition on the part of Germany to dispute with us the great Monroe doctrine when opportunity favorably presented, and to seek to extend to the Western Hemisphere her territorial spoliations. The Zimmermann letter proves that this suspicion is well founded, and that we must rely upon our naval and military strength to defend this great doctrine from invasion. The letter indicates a state of mind and a purpose on the part of Germany which demand serious consideration and prompt action on our part. It indicates an enmity which if not boldly resented by us portends greater troubles for the future. Now is the time for us to teach this mischief-making Government that our territorial integrity can not be made the subject of war bargaining; that though we are a patient and peace-loving people, we will never become graduates of the school of cowardly submission of this character. This infamous letter itself constitutes a sufficient cause for a declaration of war on our part against Germany. In the light of these recent transactions we can understand now the occasion of the presence of the German fleet at Manila and its persistence in interfering with the plans of Dewey, and convinces us now of the truth of what we then suspected, that its purpose was, if opportunity offered, to seize and hold the fruits of our victory.

Mr. President, it would seem to me that these wrongs and outrages are sufficient to call for the strong resentment of any brave and high-spirited people. But, sir, the advocates of peace now would place upon this Nation the shame of a still greater submission. They would endure still greater affronts and surrender still more important rights. What is the contention between the President of the United States and the Emperor of Germany over the settlement of which war with all of its far-reaching effects impends? On February 4, 1915, the chief of the admiral staff of the German Navy, acting under direction of the Imperial Government, issued the following proclamation:

1. The waters surrounding Great Britain and Ireland, including the whole English Channel, are hereby declared to be war zone. On and after the 18th of February, 1915, every enemy merchant ship found in the said war zone will be destroyed without its being always possible to avert the dangers threatening the crews and passengers on that account.

2. Even neutral ships are exposed to danger in the war zone, as in view of the misuse of neutral flags ordered on January 31 by the British Government and of the accidents of naval war it can not always be avoided to strike even neutral ships in attacks that are directed at enemy ships.

The purpose of this proclamation was to permit submarines to destroy merchant ships without being compelled to visit and search them and provide for the safety of the crews as required by international law before the ships should be destroyed and sunk. This proclamation was communicated to the American Government on February 6, and to which the Secretary of State, Mr. Bryan, promptly replied on February 10, 1915. In stating the position of our Government he said:

To declare or exercise a right to attack and destroy any vessel entering a prescribed area of the high seas without first certainly determining its belligerent nationality and the contraband character of its cargo would be an act so unprecedented in naval warfare that this Government is reluctant to believe that the Imperial Government of Germany in this case contemplates it as possible.

Later in his letter, in discussing the possible destruction of an American vessel or the lives of American citizens, Mr. Bryan writes:

If such a deplorable situation should arise the Imperial German Government can readily appreciate that the Government of the United States would be constrained to hold the Imperial German Government to a strict accountability for such acts of their naval authorities and to take any steps it might be necessary to take to safeguard American lives and property and to secure to American citizens the full enjoyment of their acknowledged rights on the high seas.

Further in his reply he expresses—the confident hope and expectation that the Imperial German Government can and will give assurance that American citizens and their vessels will not be molested by the naval forces of Germany otherwise than by visit and search, though their vessels may be traversing the sea area delimited in the proclamation of the German Admiralty.

Thus this communication of our Secretary of State, in substance, clearly stated American rights under acknowledged international law, boldly informed the Imperial German Government that if these rights were violated it would be held to strict accountability and that the rights of American citizens on the high seas would be vigorously defended, and diplomatically demanded assurances from the German Government that these rights would be respected and not violated. The issues he then presented are those with which we are to-day contending with the German Government. Further communications to that Government are but a greater amplification of the positions then taken.

Did we mean what we so bravely said in this note, or were we simply indulging in empty verbiage? Was our warning the mere bluff of a bully or the solemn voice of a resolute and determined people? No, Mr. President, our then Secretary of State, Mr. Bryan, in this great state paper forcibly and eloquently gave expression to the convictions of this great Republic and voiced the firm will of a brave and high-spirited people. Sir, I am satisfied that Congress will not by cowardly action upon the pending measure declare that diplomatically we roar with the voice of a lion and then when rebuffed strike with the gentle hand of a woman. Sir, as a great and true people we will square our actions with our words. Having been brave in word, we will be equally vigorous in action. The blood of pioneer ancestors who dared all dangers and perils yet tingles in our veins, and we have not yet learned the arts of the braggart nor been schooled in the language of subterfuge and dissimulation.

On the 16th of February, 1915, the German minister for foreign affairs replied to the note of the then Secretary of State, Mr. Bryan, stating:

The German Government announce merely the destruction of enemy merchant vessels found within the area of maritime war and not the destruction of all merchant vessels, as the American Government appear to have erroneously understood.

Thus the note, while disclaiming any intention of destroying neutral vessels, failed to further state what the intentions of the German Government were in extending to enemies' merchant vessels the right of visit and search and the safety of crews and passengers before destroying or sinking them. This was the situation of our diplomatic relations with the German Government when, on the 7th of May, 1915, the British steamship Lusitania was torpedoed and sunk by a German submarine in the prohibited war zone without warning, and by which over one hundred American citizens lost their lives. This act was in direct contravention of the solemn warnings previously given by our Government. It was as cruel and shameless an act of murder as was ever perpetrated. It exceeded piracy in its worst and most revolting forms. No buccaneer that ever roved the sea could boast of a more fiendish act. This cruel deed was preceded on March 28 by a German submarine sinking the British passenger steamer Falaba, through which an American citizen was drowned; also by an attack on March 28 on the American vessel Cushing by a German airplane, and the torpedoing on May 1 of the American vessel Gulflight by a German submarine, as a result of which two American citizens met their death. These continuing and accumulated atrocities were such that on the 13th of May, 1915, Mr. Bryan, then Secretary of State, dispatched to the Imperial German Government a note in which he stated:

The Government of the United States was loath to believe—it can not now bring itself to believe—that these acts, so absolutely contrary to the rules, the practices, and the spirit of modern warfare, could have the countenance or sanction of that great Government.

Further in this note the then Secretary states:

This Government has already taken occasion to inform the Imperial German Government that it can not admit the adoption of such measures or such a warning of danger to operate as in any degree an abbreviation of the rights of American shipmasters or of American citizens bound on lawful errands as passengers on ships of belligerent nationalities; and that it must hold the Imperial German Government to a strict accountability for any infringement of those rights, intentional or incidental. It does not understand the Imperial German Government to question those rights.

* * * * * * *

American citizens act within their indisputable rights in taking their ships and in traveling wherever their legitimate business calls them upon the high seas, and exercise those rights in what should be well-justified confidence that their lives will not be endangered by acts done in clear violation of universally acknowledged international obligations, and certainly in the confidence that their own Government will sustain them in the exercise of their rights.

This note closed with the bold declaration:

The Imperial German Government will not expect the Government of the United States to omit any word or any act necessary to the performance of its sacred duty of maintaining the rights of the United States and its citizens and of safeguarding their free exercise and enjoyment.

In clear presentation of American rights, in bold assertion of a determination vigorously to maintain them, and in solemn warning of what might be expected if the German Imperial Government continued to violate these rights and did not give prompt assurance that these rights would be respected, the last note of the then Secretary of State, Mr. Bryan, far exceeded the former one. On May 28, 1915, the German Minister for Foreign Affairs, replying to this note of the then Secretary of State, Mr. Bryan, stated:

With regard, firstly, to cases of the American steamers Cushing and Gulflight, the American Embassy has already been informed that it is far from the German Government to have any intention of ordering attacks by submarines or fliers on neutral vessels in the zone which have not been guilty of any hostile act. On the contrary, the most explicit instructions have been repeatedly given the German armed forces to avoid attacking such vessels.

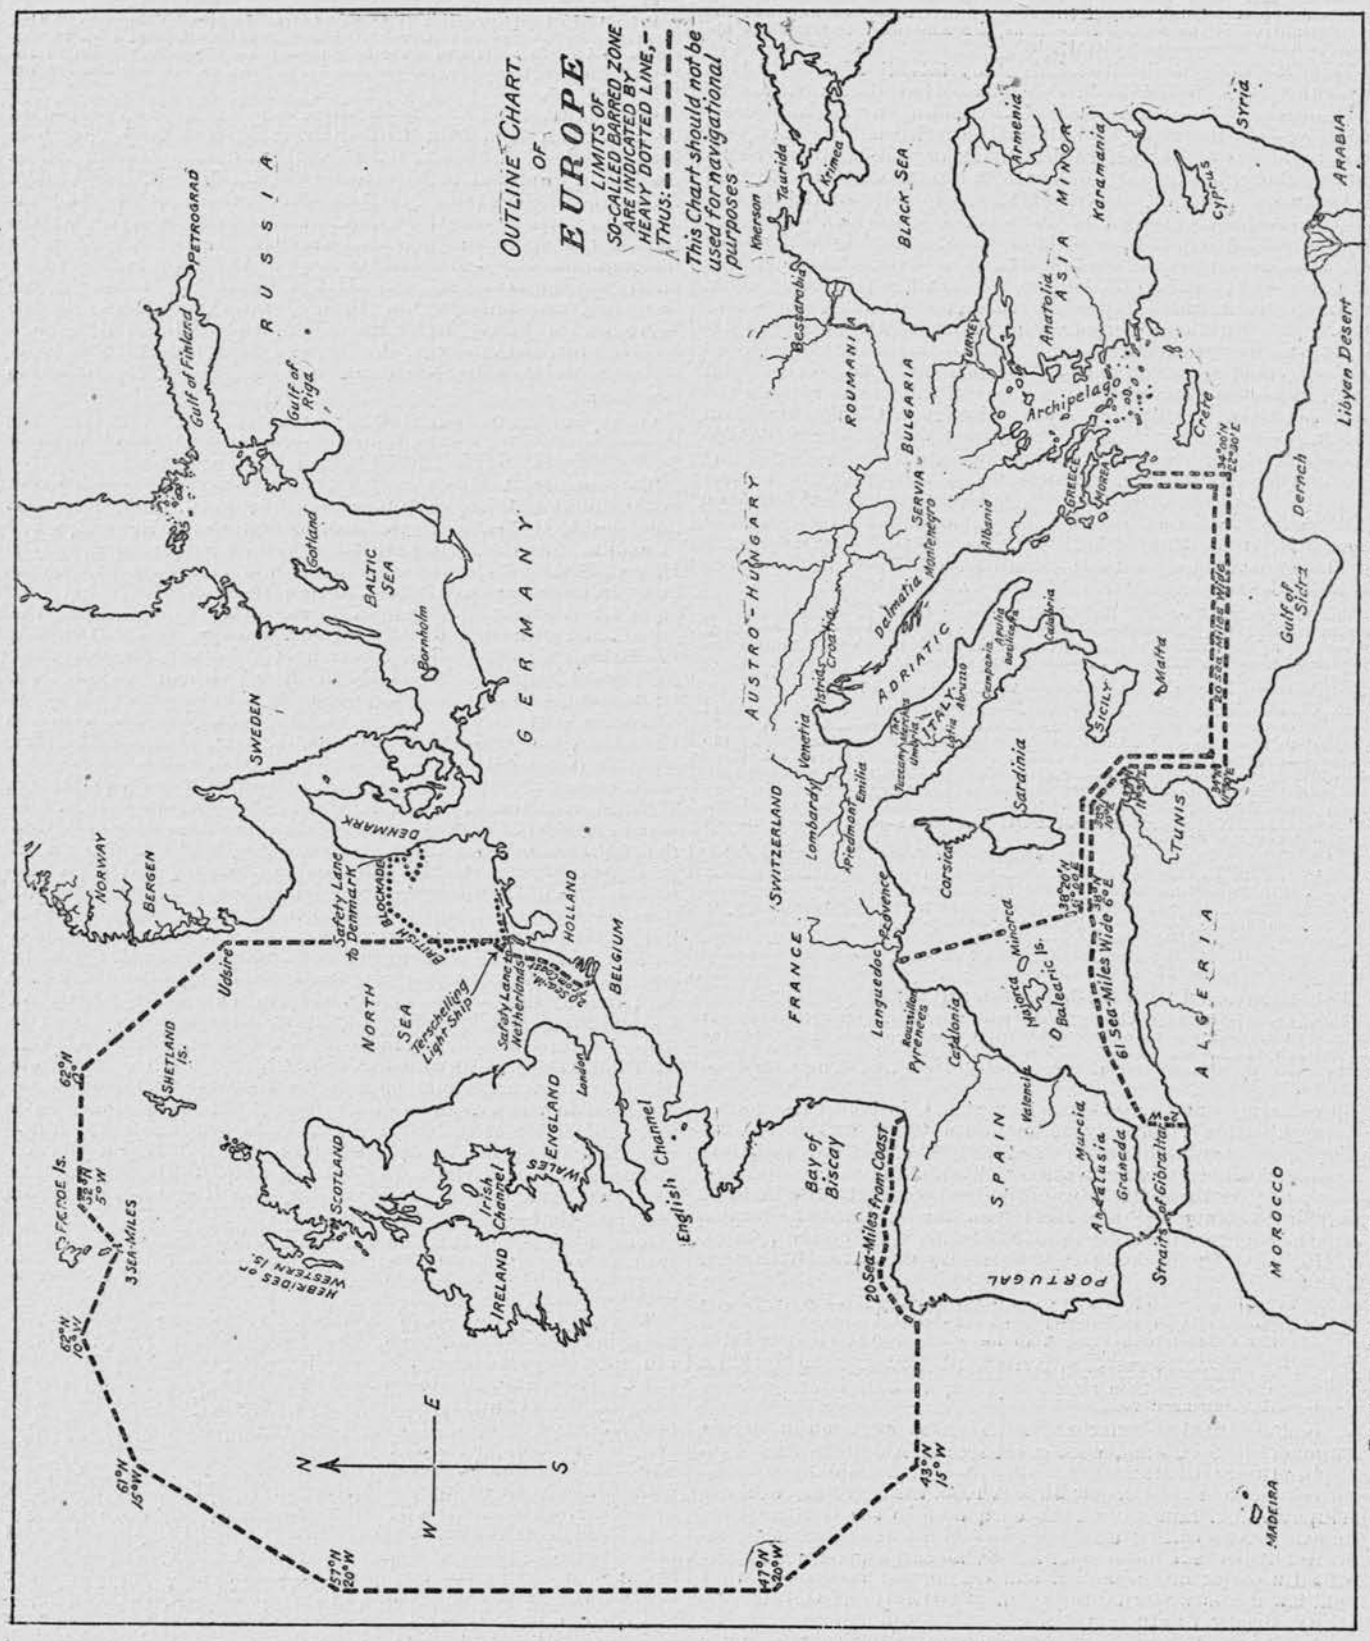
This note failed to make any satisfactory explanation of the sinking of the Lusitania, with great loss of American life, or to give any future assurances regarding the further sinking and destruction of such vessels. On June 9, 1915, the Secretary of State ad interim, Mr. Lansing, addressed a note to the German Government, again calling attention to the Lusitania incident, reiterating American claims and rights, insisting upon a satisfactory adjustment of the affair, and demanding assurances that American rights would be respected in the future. On July 21, 1915, the Secretary of State, Mr. Lansing, again addressed a note to the Imperial Government of Germany, stating that its notes regarding the sinking of the Lusitania were unsatisfactory, and further insisting upon the rights of American citizens as previously stated. In this note, discussing the freedom of the seas, Mr. Lansing declared:

The Government of the United States will continue to contend for that freedom from whatever quarter violated, without compromise and at any cost.

He closed his note with this solemn warning:

Friendship itself prompts it to say to the Imperial Government that repetition by the commanders of German naval vessels of acts in contravention of those rights must be regarded by the Government of the United States, when they affect American citizens, as deliberately unfriendly.

On August 19, 1915, the British ship Arabic was torpedoed by a German submarine without warning, and three American lives were lost. This illegal act greatly intensified the differences remaining unsettled between our Government and the German Government concerning the Lusitania. Continuously and urgently pressed by our Government for assurances regarding the use of the submarine against merchant vessels according to international law and for settlement of the Lusitania incident, finally, on the 1st of September, 1915, Count von Bernstorff, the German Ambassador to the United States, in a letter to the Secretary of State, Mr. Lansing, informed him that he had received instructions from the German Government, in its reply to the Secretary's last Lusitania note, containing the following passage:



Liners will not be sunk by our submarines without warning and without safety of the lives of noncombatants, provided that the liners do not try to escape or offer resistance.

Thus finally the German Government conceded the justice of our contention as far as liners were concerned, that they could not be sunk by submarines without first visit and search and providing for the safety of the crew and passengers. The United States Government believed that this assurance was given in good faith and would be strictly adhered to by the German Government. Yet, despite the solemn assurance thus given, on December 30, 1915, without warning, the British ship Persia was believed to have been torpedoed and two American lives were lost. On November 9, 1915, without warning, the Italian ship Ancona was torpedoed by a submarine and seven American citizens were lost. On March 24, 1916, the unarmed French steamer Sussex, engaged in the regular passenger service, was torpedoed by a German submarine without notice and sunk, through which many American lives were lost. On March 27, 1916, the British ship Englishman was torpedoed by a submarine and six Americans were lost. On December 14, 1916, the British ship Russian was torpedoed without warning and 17 Americans were lost. The German Government, with its submarines, torpedoed and destroyed many other merchant vessels than these enumerated contrary to the positive assurance given this Government by Count von Bernstorff, the German ambassador. A more faithless performance of positive promises made by one government to another can not be found anywhere than that exhibited by the German Government in these dealings with the United States. All of its assurances have been regarded as mere "scraps of paper," to be utterly disregarded when German interests or desires demanded. But all of these violations of our rights, gross and flagrant as they are, pale into insignificance in comparison with the recent injuries inflicted upon us by the action of the German Imperial Government which precipitated the present crisis. On January 31, 1917, the German ambassador, Count von Bernstorff, presented to the Secretary of State a communication from the Imperial German Government declaring that—

From February 1, 1917, all sea traffic will be stopped with every available weapon and without further notice in the following blockade zones around Great Britain, France, Italy, and in the eastern Mediterranean.

This proclamation in marking the barred zone makes it impossible for an American ship of any kind whatsoever, bent upon any purpose whatsoever, to sail to or from any parts of the British Isles, any parts of Belgium, France, or Italy. After entering the Mediterranean Sea and passing the coast of Spain and her possessions in Africa, American and other neutral vessels are only permitted to navigate this sea within a 20-mile lane leading to Greece. All other parts of the Mediterranean Sea with its vast commerce are prohibited to American and other neutral vessels for all purposes whatsoever. The proscribed zones in the proclamation are so fixed that American and other neutral vessels can approach only the northern shores of Spain in a 20-mile limit around her coast. Our own and other neutral vessels can only trade with Holland, Denmark, Norway, and Sweden by sailing very far north, being required to go above 62° north latitude, and then approaching these countries through narrow sea lanes skirting their coast. The barred or war zone in the Atlantic extends from 5° east longitude to 20° west longitude, and from about 43° north latitude to about 62° north latitude. Thus the German Imperial Government has by this proclamation appropriated absolutely to itself an area in the Atlantic Ocean about 1,400 miles in length and 1,000 miles in breadth. It extends in the Atlantic Ocean about 500 miles west from the western shores of Ireland. The German Government practically assumes ownership and control of the entire Mediterranean Sea. In this large sea area, including the proscribed zones in the Atlantic and Mediterranean, passes almost three-fourths of the world's vast foreign commerce.

Imagination is powerless to picture the great inconvenience to navigation, the immense dislocation of trade and commerce which would be occasioned if the world should submit to Germany's arrogant assumption of control and ownership of these seas. It is an act of tyranny and arrogance unprecedented in the world's history. If an American vessel sails from one of our ports containing only foodstuffs and not an article of contraband for the neutral ports of Holland, Denmark, or other neutral country, with no intention of entering the ports of any of the belligerents, and dares to cross any part of this barred zone, it becomes under this German decree a proscribed outlaw, divested of all rights of international law, all considerations of humanity, and is doomed to instant destruction by German submarines. It is the most arrogant, far-reaching, and destructive attack upon the freedom of the seas ever attempted by any nation. It gives us some faint conception of the ruthless tyranny, the fearful burdens upon navigation, the frightful depredations and spoliations that would be committed by the German Government if it should ever attain supremacy of the seas.

If Germany has a right to designate a barred war zone 500 miles from the western coast of Ireland and prohibit all vessels from entering it, she has an equal right to extend this zone farther westward, even within 20 miles of our own shores, and prohibit all vessels from entering within the zone thus enlarged. She has defiantly done this on the northern coast of Spain, a neutral country, only permitting vessels to approach and depart from these shores within a narrow sea lane of 20 miles skirting the coast. We can not shirk the issue. The conflict is on for the freedom of the seas. We are forced to a decision whether we will wage war to maintain the freedom of the seas as a common heritage for all the nations or whether we will cowardly submit to the tyrannical decree and proclamation of the German Government appropriating unto itself for its own use vast areas.

No nation is more vitally concerned in the freedom of the seas than the United States. Our foreign commerce far exceeds that of any other nation, and its continuance and its growth are indispensable to our prosperity and progress as a people. Hamper by restrictions or destroy our vast foreign commerce, and bankruptcy and ruin will overshadow alike mine, farm, and factory. The future greatness of this Nation is inseparably interwoven with the freedom of the seas. They are one and inseparable. When we wage war for this we are contending for the most vital of all American rights. If we now surrender to Germany the freedom of the seas and permit this infringement upon this common heritage, our posterity will never forgive us for the ignominy of that cowardly submission. With strong arms and brave hearts let us accept the challenge and valiantly defend our most cherished rights. While thus battling for our own most vital interests we are also contending for the rights of humanity and civilization. Do those who now counsel peace and submission to Germany fully realize the present great distress to which they invite us? Last year our total exports amounted to $5,481,000,000. Out of this, $3,382,000,000 was exported to the allied belligerent countries, with which Germany now prohibits us from having any commercial intercourse whatsoever. In other words, if we acquiesce, as many suggest, in this illegal and tyrannical proclamation and decree of the German Government, about three-fifths of our entire export business will cease at once. It would mean that at once we would be precipitated from great prosperity to acute financial and industrial distress. The great profits of mine and manufactory would immediately disappear. Present busy and thriving centers of industry would be overcrowded with the unemployed. Of our agricultural exports, two-thirds of our wheat, five-sixths of our hog products, six-sevenths of our cotton, seven-eighths of our beef, and three-fifths of our tobacco last year were exported to these allied belligerent countries. To acquiesce in Germany's prohibition of the exportation of these agricultural products to these countries would mean bankruptcy and ruin to all these great and varied agricultural interests. Sirs, submission means greater loss, greater distress than war itself. Honor, humanity, and self-interest alike demand that we should uphold to the fullest extent these important rights. The Secretary of State, Mr. Lansing, in a note to the German Government on the 21st of July, 1915, in discussing the freedom of the seas, as I have previously stated, informed the German Government that—

> The Government of the United States will continue to contend for that freedom from whatever quarter violated, without compromise, and at any cost.

Are we prepared to make good this bold declaration, or are we cowardly going to run as soon as this right is violated? When robbers approach to deprive us of our rights and possessions are we going to stand up and manfully contend with them or cowardly skulk to the cellar? Are our diplomatic demands to be enforced when made, and respected by the nations of the world, or are they to be considered mere vaporings to be abandoned when challenged by a first-class power? Are we to become a reproach in the great family of nations, noted for long-suffering and abject submission, or are we proudly to hold our head high and fearlessly enforce our demands and bravely maintain our rights? Sirs, the history of the world teaches one sure lesson: That national timidity and cowardice more than everything else are the breeders of war.

Sirs, in long national life the pathway of peace is the pathway of firmness, courage, and resolution. Prudence and foresight are wise counselors, ever to be listened to and followed, but cowardice and timidity are the worst advisers that ever poured their whisperings into the national ear. Sirs, honor, wisdom, and self-interest demand that, in the language of our Secretary of State, we should defend our rights upon the seas from whatever quarter violated, without compromise, and at any cost. The President of the United States appeals to Congress to give him the authority and the means efficiently to do this. Mr. President, the proclamation of Germany issued on the 31st of January, 1917, is not only opposed to every principle of international law and the dictates of humanity, but it is in direct contravention of her many assurances given to us during the pendency of this world-wide war, and also of her solemn treaty obligations.

In more than half a dozen notes received from the Imperial German Government on this question our Government has been assured that American and other neutral ships would not be interfered with in the war zone without visit and search and unless they carried contraband contrary to the laws of nations. This assurance since the 1st of February has been continuously and repeatedly violated. The destruction of American ships in this war zone is in direct contravention of a treaty made between the United States and the Kingdom of Prussia in 1828, extending provisions contained in the treaty of 1799, and which the German Government has recognized as valid and binding in its recent correspondence with our Government. It settled the Frye case satisfactorily with this Government on account of the provisions contained in this treaty. Its proclamation of January 31 disregards the rights conferred in this treaty to the United States, and according to the German practice it is treated as a mere "scrap of paper." The proclamation of the Imperial German Government of January 31, 1917, making all of the eastern Mediterranean, or practically this entire sea, a barred or war zone, and prohibiting all vessels from entering this sea, and thus preventing the use by any vessel of neutrals of the Suez Canal, is in clear violation of the treaty entered into by Germany with the other European powers at Constantinople in 1888. Article 1 of this treaty provides:

> The Suez maritime canal shall always be free and open, in time of war as in time of peace, to every vessel of commerce or of war, without distinction of flag.
> Consequently the high contracting parties agree not in any way to interfere with the free use of the canal in time of war as in time of peace.
> The canal shall never be subjected to the exercise of the right of blockade.

By this treaty Germany solemnly pledged herself in peace or war to do nothing to prevent the free passage of vessels through this great international sea highway. Yet she has issued a proclamation declaring that any ship traversing the sea in order to reach the Suez Canal shall be destroyed. She has clearly violated her pledge not to block this canal. This treaty becomes to Germany a mere "scrap of paper," utterly to be disregarded. The extent to which this proclamation would injure the commerce of the world if submitted to may be realized when we reflect that during 1914 the tonnage of vessels passing through the Suez Canal amounted to 17,108,000 tons, and the entire tonnage of the world's shipping at that time was 49,089,000 tons. If the tyrannical German decree is obeyed, more than one-third of the world's tonnage of shipping would be interfered with and the trade and commerce of the world to that extent dislocated and hampered. This will result in a serious injury to us. It is amazing the extent to which German tyranny and arrogance will go in injuring the commerce of the world contrary to its express promises and obligations in order to serve its own selfish interests or desires of revenge. International law is to be violated, solemn treaties disregarded, humanity ignored, the commerce of the world hampered and destroyed in order that German submarines, which have become the murderous assassins of the sea, may more easily operate in their destructive purposes. Everything that is right and humane, all law, plighted faith, and honor itself thus are surrendered to the more efficient use of this murderous weapon. This new murderous weapon must not conform itself to international law and the principles of humanity and to obligations of treaties, but all of these must yield and be obliterated in order to give increased potency to this instrument of destruction.

Mr. President, these numerous affronts, wrongs, broken pledges, and flagrant violations of our vital rights and interests were such as to compel the President of the United States to sever all diplomatic relations with Germany and to give the German ambassador his passports and to recall our ambassador from Berlin. Unless we should have promptly declared war there was no other course left for a self-respecting nation to follow. It was hoped that this would be a sufficient warning to Germany to induce her to make proper redress for our grievances and give us assurances that there would be no future infraction of our rights and to abandon her lawless order of January 31, 1917, but all of these hopes have been shattered. We have almost forgotten the wrongs of the past in amazement at the outrages of the present. Germany has shown a fixed determination to enforce by ruthless warfare the infamous purposes indicated in her proclamation of January 31. On March 16 last the American steamer Vigilancia, bearing the American flag, having a cargo consisting of dried fruit, straw, and other merchandise, sailing from New York for Havre, was torpedoed and sunk by a submarine without warning, and 15 American citizens were lost. The ship was flying a United States flag and so marked that there could be no doubt of her nationality. On March 17 last, 44 miles off the Irish coast, the American steamer City of Memphis, flying the American flag and sailing from Cardiff to New York in ballast, was torpedoed by a submarine and sunk, the crew escaping in their own small boats and enduring great hardships and suffering before they were landed ashore. The City of Memphis was unarmed and did not use wireless. She was on her way to New York, contained no contraband or illegal cargo, and could not have been considered in any way as aiding Germany's enemies.

The nationality of this boat could not have been mistaken. On March 17 last the American tanker Illinois, flying the American flag and sailing from London to Port Arthur, Tex., was torpedoed by a submarine and sunk within 20 miles north of Alderney. This ship was shelled by the submarine without warning and one of the crew wounded. No measures were taken by the submarine for the safety of the crew. The crew were for more than six hours in small boats and encountered much danger and suffering. As this ship was returning from London to its home port in America in ballast, it could not have been considered in the remotest degree rendering any assistance to any enemy of Germany. There could have been no doubt as to the nationality of the ship. On March 21 last, 25 miles north of the Netherlands coast, the American oil ship Healdton, sailing from Philadelphia for Rotterdam, a neutral port of Holland, and flying the American flag, was twice torpedoed by a submarine without warning, no opportunity being given between first and second torpedoes for men to take the boats, and was sunk, and 21 of her crew were lost, including many American citizens. The suffering endured by the survivors after more than 17 hours' exposure in small boats in a cold wind, choppy sea, and snow flurries were terrible, and two died of exposure. This American ship was sailing from America to a neutral port, and, it is claimed, was within the zone of safety indicated in the German proclamation of January 31. The submarine could not have failed to have known the nationality of this ship.

None of these four American ships offered any resistance to the submarine or attempted to escape. None of them were armed. In destroying these vessels in no case did the submarine make any provisions for the safety of the crew or make any efforts to aid them. None of them were conveying munitions of war or contraband to the enemies of Germany. They were engaged in peaceful and lawful commerce. The only offense committed by these four American vessels was that in the prosecution of their legitimate business they sailed upon open seas, the free and common heritage of all nations, but which the German Imperial Government by its decree of January 31 last had forbidden them to use, and for this, and this alone, they encountered ruthless destruction at the hands of German submarines. All of these vessels were of American registry, flying the American flag, and entitled to all the protection that the Stars and Stripes can give. But, sirs, more than this: Before they ventured upon these seas their Government had given them solemn assurance that in so doing they would be fully protected in their rights.

In discussing the possible destruction of an American vessel by Germany, in his letter of January 10, 1915, to the German Government, Mr. Bryan, Secretary of State, as I have previously stated, used the following language:

> If such a deplorable situation should arise, the Imperial German Government can readily appreciate that the Government of the United States would be constrained to hold the Imperial German Government to a strict accountability for such acts of their naval authorities and to take any steps it might be necessary to take to safeguard American lives and property and to secure to American citizens the full enjoyment of their acknowledged rights on the high seas.

In the note of July 21, 1915, to the German Government, as previously stated, the Secretary of State, Mr. Lansing, in protesting against any infringement of the freedom of the seas by orders proscribing vessels entering certain limits, pledged this Government to defend the freedom of the seas from whatever quarter attacked, without compromise and at any cost.

Mr. President, our citizens owning vessels and navigating them had a right to rely upon these official promises and assurances. Shall we now keep faith with them or cowardly fail them when a real test comes? Shall we use all the vast power possessed by this great Government to protect them, as we have officially and solemnly pledged, or cravenly leave their wrongs unredressed and unavenged? Shall we permit our flag, the emblem of our honor, our power, and our aspirations, to be lawlessly and deliberately assaulted upon the high seas, and then not strike with all the force possessed by us the arrogant assailant? If we do not vigorously do this, then indeed has "Old Glory," the most cherished object of our pride and affection, sunk to low depths of shame and humiliation; we are no longer worthy sons of worthy sires. The heritage of courage, fortitude, and honor bequeathed to us will have indeed been foully forfeited. The American flag will no longer be, as it was made by our brave and worthy forefathers, the shield and protection of American citizens in every part of the world. The stars of our statehood and Union will no longer gleam from unsullied skies. Their radiance will be dimmed by clouds of doubt, timidity, and fear. But, sirs, if we will meet the present emergency with our accustomed firmness, resolution, and energy, with a union of hearts and a union of purpose, and boldly assert and maintain our rights to the fullest extent of our power, then our flag will attain a richer and a deeper majesty, a brighter and a greater glory.

Mr. President, as I have previously stated, the issue presented to us for decision is not one of mere peace or war. In the attack just enumerated upon four American vessels flying the American flag, without provocation, by her naval boats Germany is herself waging relentless and persistent warfare against us. These repeated acts constitute warfare in its worst and most despicable form. What else can Germany do to wage war against us except with her submarines to attack our ships and commerce and assault our flag? She has already invited Mexico and Japan to join in warfare against us. How much further must she go in order to satisfy some of our hesitating citizens that she is directing warfare against us? Do we need further insults, affronts, and injuries to move our indignation? Sirs, these have become so numerous and flagrant that in self-respect we have been compelled to sever all diplomatic relations with her. Can a greater injury be done a nation than a wanton attack upon its flag? Sirs, Germany has heaped upon us every insult, conspired against our internal and external peace, spat and trampled upon our flag, foully murdered 319 of our citizens, and perpetrated wanton acts of war upon us. She has inflicted every injury upon us except an actual invasion of our territory. Are there any among us cowardly or foolish enough to desire to be quiescent until this is done? Does anyone doubt that if the German fleet was released from blockade by the British fleet and free to do so, it would not already be upon our shores endeavoring to do its work of devastation and ruin? Is anyone foolish enough to imagine that, if Germany was free from European troubles and had a large army that she could safely land here, she would not do so and endeavor to conquer us and obtain lodgment and territory in the Western Hemisphere?

No, Mr. President, since the 1st of February last Germany has defiantly ignored our warnings not to infringe upon our rights upon the high seas and has been waging warfare against us with every instrumentality available for use by her. The question for us is, Shall we accept the war which she is now waging, or submit to her demands and injuries? There are some who seek to avert the direct issue by advocating the following of the policy known as armed neutrality. This policy was wise before Germany had commenced warfare by attacking and destroying four American ships. This policy would have been an additional warning to her that if she attacked our ships and flag she must expect at our hands prompt and efficient warfare. Prior to the commencement of hostilities by Germany, armed neutrality would have been our wise and proper course. It might have averted war, but Congress failed to give its approval to this policy as recommended by the President. The failure to venture even so far as armed neutrality to redress our wrongs and defend our rights encouraged Germany to further insult and injury and made her believe that we could not under any circumstances be forced into war. Moved by this conviction, she has deliberately attacked and destroyed four American ships. Armed neutrality after these occurrences would be a cowardly makeshift unworthy of this great Republic. It would simply mean that after Germany has clearly evinced her deliberate purpose to destroy all American ships found in the barred war zone we would foolishly send our merchant ships there relying only upon their own powers of defense. We would be sending our peaceful vessels of commerce to be attacked by the public war vessels of Germany, and at the same time withholding from our vessels the assistance of our own naval forces. Sirs, one of the chief reasons we incurred the vast expenditure in creating a Navy was through it to extend protection to our trade and commerce. No, sir. Armed neutrality, whatever might have been its benefits heretofore, would be but a miserable failure, encouraging Germany to further aggression and injuries. If we send our merchant vessels in this proscribed zone, they should go there with the positive assurance that they will receive all the protection that the power of this Government can give. To do otherwise would be but an invitation to Germany to attack them knowing that they must depend upon themselves for defense and could not rely for any assistance upon the naval and military forces of this Government.

Mr. President, we can not avoid it. The only wise, manly, and honorable course for us to pursue is to accept the conditions of warfare precipitated by Germany, declare the existing state of war between Germany and the United States, give authority to the President to use the Army and Navy of this country to wage the war thus unjustly brought on us, augment our Army and Navy, and use every resource possessed by us to wage this war efficiently and successfully. We are not waging war against the German people, but against its military and autocratic Government, which, we believe, contrary to the wishes of the German people, has inflicted these many injuries upon us and severed the ties of friendship which have for more than a century bound us to the German people. We believe that when the war-mad and military autocracy which now rules Germany has been chastened or overthrown the ties of friendship now severed will be reunited and become firmer and stronger. In waging this war we will be aiding the free, liberal, and democratic nations to overthrow in Germany the last refuge of autocracy and militarism.

Mr. President, in making this decision for war we are fully aware of the perils that may lie in our pathway. We are fully conscious of the many difficulties which we must meet and must overcome. We fully realize the many sacrifices that we must make to achieve victory in order to redress our wrongs and maintain our rights. We are not enamored of the pomp and glory of war, and only accept it because impelled to do so by national honor and national vital interests. Having entered this pathway, however, protracted and tiresome the journey may be, we will follow it to the end. Having crossed the Rubicon, boldly and bravely we will march to Rome. With brave heart and resolute will we will bend every energy of mind and body to the successful prosecution of this war. Every resource at our command will be dedicated to the cause of our country. If misfortunes should come we will not be discouraged, but they will but serve to stimulate us to greater endeavor. We know full well that if the 100,000,000 people constituting this great Republic act in unison of mind and heart for service of country we can successfully meet all perils, difficulties, and dangers which may befall us, and emerge from this conflict stronger, better, greater.

At this critical time let us have a revival of the patriotic fervor and love of country which so strongly pulsated in the hearts of our forefathers. Let us feel as they felt, that public honor is private honor, that public disgrace is private disgrace, that public failure is private failure, that public success is private success. These were the principles and sentiments that animated the founders of this Republic and made possible its greatness and glory. Let us feel, as our fathers felt, that the bugle call to battle and duty is far more pleasing to the ear than the dinner gong inviting to feast and revelry. Let us cultivate the stronger and sterner virtues which must now bear the burdens of national difficulties. The clock of national patriotism now strikes for each of us our hour of work and responsibility. The voices which speak to us from the past, the inspiration which springs from the present, the possibilities that crown the future should awaken in each of us a fervid and lofty patriotism and confirm the resolve of each of us in this hour of storm and stress valiantly to serve this Republic, and with strong arms and brave hearts defend her against every enemy that may assail her, and thus in the end enable this great people to advance along the pathway of justice, liberty, and peace.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, no one is more conscious than I that this is a moment for action and not for debate. But, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations and having taken part in framing this resolution, I wish briefly to state why I support it with the greatest earnestness of which I am capable.

The most momentous power entrusted to Congress by the Constitution is the authority to declare war, and never has Congress been called to a more solemn exercise of this great function than at this moment. We have submitted to wrongs and outrages from the central powers of Europe—wrongs which involve not only injury to property but the destruction of American lives—with a long patience. We have borne and foreborne to the very limit of endurance. Now the inevitable end is here and we are about to declare war against Germany.

Speaking for myself and, I hope, for my associates generally on this side of the Chamber, I desire to say that in this crisis, and when the country is at war, party lines will disappear, and this disappearance of the party line will, I am confident, not be confined to the minority. Both Democrats and Republicans must forget party in the presence of the common danger. This is not, and can not be, a party war. It is a war in which all Americans must be united, and no one must ask a loyal citizen, high or low, who seeks to serve his country in the field or in civil life to what party he belongs, any more than it would be possible to ask his religion or his race. As Americans we shall all, I am sure, be prepared to give to the Executive money, men, and all the necessary powers for waging war with energy and driving it forward to a successful conclusion. The President has made recommendations as to the action which he hopes Congress will take, with which I for one am in most thorough accord.

We have only a very small Army and we must proceed at once as rapidly as possible to build up a large one fit to defend the country in any emergency. We must provide for the future and for the supply of men for the Army by a system of universal military training. I agree with the President that this new Army should be chosen upon the "principle of universal liability to service." Our Navy is strong in certain branches and very weak in others. It must be our business to supply the deficiencies as rapidly as possible. Fortunately those deficiencies are of the kind which can be most quickly supplied. It is our duty to see to it that all the money and all the legislation necessary for both the Army and Navy are given at once.

The President has said that war "will involve the utmost practicable cooperation in counsel and action with the Governments now at war with Germany and, as incident to that, the extension to those Governments of the most liberal financial credits, in order that our resources may so far as possible be added to theirs." I am not only in full agreement with this policy advised by the President, but it seems to me that nothing is more important than to follow it out. I am as thorough a believer as ever in the general policy laid down by Washington when he advised the people of the United States not to enter into permanent alliances; but the man who won the American Revolution through the alliance with France would have been the last to lay down a hard and fast rule that under no circumstances and for no purposes were we ever to ally ourselves with other nations. He covers this point completely in the Farewell Address, where he says:

> Taking care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments on a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

Farseeing and wise, he knew very well that dangers might come which would make a temporary alliance or agreement with foreign nations imperative. That time has arrived. It would be madness for us to attempt to make war alone upon Germany, and find ourselves, perhaps, at the end left isolated, at war with that power, when all the other nations had made peace, because we had not associated ourselves with them. The allies of the entente, as they are called, are fighting a common foe, and their foe is now ours. We can not send a great army across the ocean, for we have no army to send. Yet I should be glad for one if we could send now 10,000 men of our Regular troops, so that the flag of the United States might at least be unfurled in the fields of France. I believe that the mere sight of that flag in that region made so desolate by war would stimulate the courage and help the success of those who have the same aim which we have and who seek the same victory. We can also help the allies, as the President recommends, with large credits and with those supplies which we can furnish and which they lack. We can not do more in any direction to bring this war to a speedy end than to give those credits and furnish those supplies.

The President has told us that German spies "were here even before the war began, and it is, unhappily, not a matter of conjecture, but a fact proved in our courts of justice, that the intrigues which have more than once come perilously near to disturbing the peace and dislocating the industries of the country have been carried on at the instigation, with the support, and even under the personal direction of official agents of the Imperial Government accredited to the Government of the United States." I believe myself that the overwhelming mass of our citizens of German descent are just as loyal to the United States as any citizens could possibly be. But there is this class of agents of the Imperial German Government who are ready to engage in plots and crimes to the injury of the people of this country. "Disloyalty," if I may again borrow the words of the President, "must be put down with a firm hand."

The purpose of the German submarine campaign is the destruction of the world's mercantile tonnage. In the old days, in previous wars, the ships of warring nations were captured, frequently in large numbers, as was the case when our privateers ranged the English Channel in the War of 1812. But it must not be forgotten that, with few exceptions, these merchant vessels, when captured, were sent into port, condemned as prizes, and again put afloat. The total tonnage of the world was not materially reduced. But the German submarine war, ruthlessly carried on, is directed toward the destruction of the tonnage of the whole world. Forced into war, as we now are, our first action should be to repair in some measure this loss to our own tonnage and to that of the world by seizing the ships of Germany now in our ports and putting that additional tonnage into the world's service.

Mr. President, we have never been a military Nation; we are not prepared for war in the modern sense; but we have vast resources and unbounded energies, and the day when war is declared we should devote ourselves to calling out those resources and organizing those energies so that they can be used with the utmost effect in hastening the complete victory. The worst of all wars is a feeble war. War is too awful to be entered upon half-heartedly. If we fight at all, we must fight for all we are worth. It must be no weak, hesitating war. The most merciful war is that which is most vigorously waged and which comes most quickly to an end.

Mr. President, no one feels the horrors of war more than I. It is with no light heart, but with profound sadness, although with hope and courage, that I see my country compelled to enter the great field of conflict. But there are, in my opinion, some things worse for a nation than war. National degeneracy is worse; national cowardice is worse. The division of our people into race groups, striving to direct the course of the United States in the interest of some other country when we should have but one allegiance, one hope, and one tradition is far worse. All these dangers have been gathering about us and darkening the horizon during the last three years. Whatever suffering and misery war may bring it will at least sweep these foul things away. Instead of division into race groups, it will unify us into one Nation, and national degeneracy and national cowardice will slink back into the darkness from which they should never have emerged.

I also believe that on our entrance into this war, under the conditions which it has assumed, our future peace, our independence as a proud and high-spirited Nation, our very security are at stake. There is no other way, as I see it, except by war to save these things without which national existence is a mockery and a sham. But there is a still higher purpose here as I look upon it. The President has said with great justice that Germany is making war on all nations. We do not enter upon this war to secure victory for one nation as against another. We enter this war to unite with those who are fighting the common foe in order to preserve human freedom, democracy, and modern civilization. They are all in grievous peril; they are all threatened. This war is a war, as I see it, against barbarism, not the anarchical barbarism of what are known as the Dark Ages, but organized barbarism panoplied in all the devices for the destruction of human life which science, beneficent science, can bring forth. We are resisting an effort to thrust mankind back to forms of government, to political creeds and methods of conquest which we had hoped had disappeared forever from the world. We are fighting against a nation which, in the fashion of centuries ago, drags the inhabitants of conquered lands into slavery; which carries off women and girls for even worse purposes; which in its mad desire to conquer mankind and trample them under foot has stopped at no wrong, has regarded no treaty. The work which we are called upon to do when we enter this war is to preserve the principles of human liberty, the principles of democracy, and the light of modern civilization; all that we most love, all that we hold dearer than life itself. In such a battle we can not fail to win. I am glad that my country is to share in this preservation of human freedom. I wish to see my country gathered with the other nations who are fighting for the same end when the time for peace comes. We seek no conquests, we desire no territory and no new dominions. We wish simply to preserve our own peace and our own security, to uphold the great doctrine which guards the American hemisphere, and to see the disappearance of all wars or rumors of wars from the East, if any dangers there exist. What we want most of all by this victory which we shall help to win is to secure the world's peace, broad-based on freedom and democracy, a world not controlled by a Prussian military autocracy, by Hohenzollerns and Hapsburgs, but by the will of the free people of the earth. We shall achieve this result, and when we achieve it we shall be able to say that we have helped to confer great blessings upon mankind, and that we have not fought in vain. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. Did the doorkeepers distribute the cards to the people who entered the galleries? [A pause.] The doorkeepers will remove all persons whom they can identify as interfering with the rules of the Senate. They have had fair warning.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, the elements of genuine greatness in the statesman show themselves in the hour of stress, when through the mists of passion he is able to see clearly the path of duty and, in "spite of the stare of the wise and the world's derision," dares to follow it undismayed.

The atmosphere enveloping this Capitol has been for the past year surcharged with the spirit of prejudice, of hate, love, and all the bad and good passions that grow out of the ravages of war to such an extent that men have lost their bearings and discarded for the time that poise and power of deliberation which usually characterizes their conduct. All order festers to their abnormal vision, and everything seems out of joint.

Of all the times in the history of this Nation when Congressmen and the people generally should hold themselves in due bounds and keep their heads, now is the time. As the little chunks, water-sogged, having found their proper place in the bottom of the lake will rise to the surface when the waters are lashed by the fury of the storm, so may we expect small men to come to the front and be heard for their much talking and little thinking in this moment of national disorder and desperate tragedy. But after the war is over and order shall be restored these verbal patriots, in obedience to the rule which finally determines the eternal fitness of things, will return again to their former places from which they were lifted by the influences of this world-wide cataclasm.

There are two classes of men who will attract public attention in this tragic hour. The first will be the heroic group of determined men who in performing their proper part in the affairs of the country will not consider the cost or measure the dangers involved to themselves since they will bear the responsibilities and suffer all the consequences of their own acts and utterances. The other is the large group of men known for their much verbigerations and mock heroism, paucity of ideas, and plasticity of conscience who are comfortably ensconced in a bombproof position far from the unerring shot of the enemy. This large group of little men with the flame of vaunted patriotism burning on their insincere tongues will not hesitate to count the cost in sorrow and death which others are to suffer as the result of their foolish immaturely considered acts. Intolerance, bigotry, self-assumed superiority are qualities of mind which should excite contempt rather than admiration. They are the attributes of little minds and dwarfed souls and stamp the one afflicted with them as incompetent for leadership, rather than being accomplishments fitting him to participate in directing the affairs of a great Nation at a critical moment of its history.

Much depends upon what this Congress may do. The present is pregnant with momentous issues; the provocations are great and the tide of passion runs high. Each Senator and Representative should remember that by his vote he is making history to-day. He may possibly be signing the death warrant of hundreds of thousands of his fellow citizens, bringing sorrow and distress to hundreds of now happy homes, and burdening posterity with a debt which will sap the moral and mental natures and weaken the physical fiber of the generations yet to come, and thereby destroy the virility of the race by its crushing burden. He should also remember that the Republic is on trial. Democratic principles in government, so dear to the fathers, are being subjected to the acid test. Crimination and recrimination, partisanship, and personal politics are as much out of place in the deliberations of this body to-day as unregenerate sin in the realm of infinite morality.

Mr. President, there comes a time in the life of every man when the performance of duty imposes a painful process. To move along the lines of least resistance, to drift with the tide, to keep step with the thoughtless gang is the natural impulse of the human heart. I find myself in a position this morning where I wish my sense of obligation to the people I have the honor in part to immediately represent in this Chamber particularly, and the American people generally, would permit me to vote as I am sure a large majority of my colleagues will vote on the pending question. Their patriotism I do not question, and the wisdom of their course will be determined by time alone.

I only wish I could believe that the thing the Senate is about to do will redound to the interests of the American people, but for the life of me I can not bring myself to believe it will contribute to the welfare of the great mass of American people and to the happiness of the world, and elevate and render more permanent the civilization of mankind.

I do not in any way condone the crimes which Germany has committed against the American people and the commerce of the world. I do not deny that the law has been violated and that we have a legal right to declare war. Many things have occurred which are shocking to my every idea of humanity. Such acts of brutality can be excused or accounted for only upon the theory that the perpetrators were frenzied with hate and engaged in a life-and-death struggle. But the crimes committed in this war can not all be charged to one nation.

The allies have also violated international law, sunk our ships, killed our citizens, and committed other crimes which I know were only incidental to the prosecution of cruel warfare. Yes, they all have done things that in the calmer and saner moments would have caused them to shudder with horror and hang their heads in shame. The warring forces of Mexico have also manifested the brutalizing influence of war. They have outraged innocent women, murdered little children, atrociously killed our men, and destroyed millions upon millions of dollars' worth of property. But these, I repeat, were all, or most of them, incidental; they grew out of war's brutalities—cruel, criminal, foolish war. It only shows to what depths men will fall when engaged in the commerce of the beast, and furnishes another reason also why America should keep out of this slaughter pen. It will not be forgotten that notwithstanding the unlawful and brutal conduct of Mexico the American voter at the polls last fall approved the Wilson administration and continued it in power as a reward for keeping us out of war. Don't forget that. Men talk of civilized warfare. There is no such thing. In its mildest and least objectionable form it is what Sherman said it was, "It is hell." If our joining in this war in Europe would relieve the world of this burning, devouring, devastating social cancer that is destroying the world body politic, there might be some justification for the adoption of this resolution. I do not believe that we will relieve the situation by becoming a party to the horrors and brutalities of the conflict, but, on the contrary, I believe our entrance into it will only serve to postpone the day of an amicable settlement. I was impressed with the President's suggestion in his message to Congress Monday night that permanent world peace will come only by the dethronement of kings and establishing in their stead throughout the nations of the earth governments by the people.

The President also suggested that if the people who are now engaged in this war in Europe had been consulted there would have been no war. If I may be permitted to indulge in a little speculation I will say, Mr. President, that if the people of the United States—I mean the plain, honest people, the masses who are to bear the burden of taxation and fight the Nation's battles, were consulted—the United States would not make a declaration of war against Germany to-day. If the women and children, who are the greatest sufferers in time of war, were consulted, the voice would come back in thunderous tones as it gathered volume from the tenement houses of the great cities, the factories, the farm homes, and all along through the humbler walks of life, on its way to Washington, directing the President and Congress to find some other way, if possible, to settle it rather than by the arbitrament of the sword. The great moral sentiment of the world would approve such a course—such a course would be unusual, but the uniqueness of the thing would challenge the admiration of mankind and lift humanity from the brutal bog in which it has wallowed since the dark days of the beginning. America is great enough to set a precedent in a great world-serving, man-saving, moral movement of that character. Nothing will be settled by the United States entering into this war except the question of superiority of strength.

The President hopes that by sacrificing millions of Americans, spending a few billion dollars, taken from the products of the toiling masses of this country, we may be able to "organize the parliament of man," and bring about "the federation of the world." It is a big price to pay, but probably the consummation will be worth the sacrifice. It is a fine, big idea the President has for the salvation of the world. I wish him Godspeed in his good efforts in that direction. But the world will not take his big ideas by force of arms. He can not "draw down this new Republic held in air and make for it a foundation on the earth" by using the methods of the brute. Moral reform must come by virtue of inherent merit and not by the force of standing armies. A hired professional soldiery is inconsistent with free institutions. Love of country is the saving, conserving influence in republics—it is the very soul of our system of government. It ought to be a glorious privilege for a patriotic citizen to give his life in defense of his country. It ought to be a highly prized opportunity in the hour of trial, such as we are passing through to-day, for a citizen of this Republic to offer his services in defense of his flag. For a righteous cause I am sure that 10,000,000 American men would rush to the colors and hesitate not to consider the consequences. They would come christened with the tears of loving mothers, devoted wives, and loyal sisters, and with hearts afire with unquenchable patriotism they would keep "Old Glory" unstained and triumphant in the air. Compulsory military service is at this time an affront to the patriotism of the better class of our people. It should be resorted to only when we are down to the dregs for men. But, Mr. President, I do not feel like sacrificing a million men—I can not afford to break the hearts of loving mothers, becloud the lives of devoted wives, and shadow the souls of orphaned children with ineffable sorrow, in order to liberate Germany from the cruel domination of kings, without first consulting the people who are to be sacrificed for the deliverance. I have the right to give my own life for such a cause, but I have no right to give the life of any loving mother's son or the husband of a devoted wife or the father of little children who are probably dependent for bread upon his daily toil.

We are told that the masses of the people of Europe were not consulted about the war flagrant there to-day. Their consent was not obtained before the war was started and they will not be permitted to determine the time of its ending. And that is true. If they had been consulted, the differences between the warring Governments would have been honestly and fairly settled by arbitration rather than by wage of battles involving the sacrifice of human lives. The ruling classes are alone responsible for the disgraceful condition in Europe to-day, a condition which stamps their pretended faith in the Prince of Peace as a bloody lie. The meek and lowly Nazarene is held up as a disciple of Mars, and hate has taken the place of love in our religion. Now, if the ruling classes of Europe are responsible for that war, if they brought it on without consulting the people, how can we, the Members of Congress and the Executive, the governing head of this great Rupublic, how can we justify involving this country in a war which will necessarily result in the slaughter of millions of men and the squandering of billions of dollars—I repeat, how can we explain to our constituents why we had plunged them into this vortex of murder and plunder without consulting them and getting their consent? If it is wrong for a king to plunge his subjects into the vortex of war without their consent, it can not be less reprehensible for the President of the United States and the Congress to involve their constituents in a war without their consent. There is no necessity for haste in this matter. It were better to suspend commerce for a while, lose a little money or profits, if you please, and save from slaughter a few hundred thousand of the bravest and best men beneath the stars. But I apprehend that some one may say, we have not time to wait, our honor is at stake. That matter I prefer to let the people determine. If they want war, if they are willing to pay the price of war, if they feel that the offense justifies war, since they must pay the price in blood and treasure, in the name of God let them settle that question for themselves.

Mr. President, I am not going to vote for this resolution. I do not believe that it is necessary to go to war in order to bring about a settlement of this desperate trouble with honor to America, but I am not going to interfere with or delay in any way the final consideration of the resolution. I want Congress to act upon it, and act upon it right now. I have no doubt about its passage, and for that reason I am overwhelmed with a sense of anxiety, not for myself, not for any individual, but for the welfare of all the people, and especially the great toiling masses of America, upon whom will fall the larger part of the burden. When the resolution shall pass, we will be in a state of war with Germany. Every American citizen will then be called upon to go to the defense of the flag, and I trust he will respond promptly to the demands of the hour, and if need be, give his life and his all to uphold the Nation's cause. I shall vote to give the President men and money to the last citizen able to bear arms, and every dollar that shall be necessary to meet the expenses of the war. I shall do more. My own services shall be offered to do whatever may be necessary within my power in support of my country's cause. I trust there will be no break in the ranks, no hesitating, no question, but that all Americans may present a solid, invincible front to the common enemy. I have hoped, I repeat, that the question might be settled peaceably by negotiations, but when the Congress decides that only by the arbitrament of the sword it shall be settled, then to that task we will devote our hands, our heads, our hearts, and the products of our toil. May the God of nations in His infinite wisdom lead the Congress and the American people safely through the dark and perilous valley which our country is called upon at this time to pass.

I do love
My country's good with a respect more tender,
More holy and profound than my own life.

And to her service I hereby dedicate my life and all that I possess.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I listened to the greater part of the speeches made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I shall not attempt to answer those speeches, although it seems to me answer would be easy.

In the circumstances of this fateful hour I think it best not now to enter into the domain of controversy. I wish merely to put this much in the RECORD in the interest of historical accuracy. The Senators adverted to certain facts to justify their arguments, but adverted only to a part of the facts, and in numerous instances neglected to state the whole truth of the facts to which they did advert. But that sort of thing has been from time immemorial done by advocates who seek to justify before the people the wisdom and the justice of what they do. However, it is certain that impartial history will record the whole truth, and so far as I am concerned I will let controversy go for this immediate day and time.

Mr. President, I fear that the Congress is about to involve the United States in this European war, and when you do that my belief is that you will commit the greatest national blunder of history. I shall vote against this mistake, to prevent which, God helping me, I would gladly lay down my life.

Until the Congress shall otherwise command, I shall stand as I have stood from the beginning, and even now I lift my voice in solemn warning against this blunder. But if the constituted powers of my Government, the powers constitutionally authorized to speak for the people on this momentous issue, shall decide for war, and we go into war, then I shall cast all doubts and forebodings to the winds, and my eyes thenceforth will be blind to everything but the flag of my country borne by American boys through the storm of war, and my ears deaf to every call save that of my country in its hour of peril. If Congress unfurls the battle flag, however profound my sorrow, I will at once stand in salute to that flag, dutifully willing and ready to perform any service or make any sacrifice necessary to bring the cause we espouse to a successful issue.

To my countrymen everywhere I say that while we may differ as we do about the policy of entering this war, once in it all differences must cease. In war there can be no divided patriotism. In war the eyes of an American can behold but one flag. In a time of stress like that all gaps must be closed and our front become as solid as a wall.

If we declare for war there must be no halting; we must make war in earnest. We know what that means. But when war is declared, if it is declared, honor and patriotism alike demand that we shrink not to enter, if need be, into the very mouth of hell.

Mr. President, if your decision be for war, there is nothing that any sane, patriotic, honorable American could do that I will not do to make that war a success. I will stand ready instantly to take my full share of the responsibility and the burden.

Mr. President, I have finished.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I offer the following substitute for the joint resolution before the Senate. I ask that the Secretary may read it. I simply desire to preface the reading by the statement that I have formulated a concurrent rather than a joint resolution, because I have a conviction that Congress alone has the power to either make or refuse war, and that it does not need the signature of the President as a joint resolution would need it. I ask the Secretary to read the concurrent resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. SAULSBURY). The Secretary will read the concurrent resolution.

The Secretary read as follows:

Concurrent resolution asserting certain of the duties imposed upon belligerents by international law in the maintenance of a blockade, defining certain of the inalienable and vital rights of American vessels and American citizens on the high seas, and declaring that a willful violation of these rights by any belligerent will be regarded and accepted as an act and declaration of war against the United States.

Be it resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Government of the United States recognizes the right of any belligerent engaged in the present European war to establish and maintain a blockade of the ports of its enemies against the imports of contraband goods, and that such blockade may be effectuated through the employment of any type of marine war craft: Provided, That well recognized rules of international law are followed; that in the enforcement of such blockade the belligerent power may exercise the right of search and seizure for the purpose of determining whether any neutral vessel passing through the blockaded zone is destined to a neutral port or is engaged in carrying contraband of war to her enemy, and may detain a neutral vessel for such time as may be reasonably necessary to ascertain that fact, but that in the exercise of that right the merchant vessel of a neutral must first be summoned to submit to such visitation and can not be lawfully fired upon unless she attempts to escape after receiving such summons.

If contraband is found upon such neutral vessel and it is impossible or impracticable to take it into port and subject it to the investigation of a prize court, the right to destroy such contraband cargo by the blockading power is acknowledged by this country, but that the question of the contraband character of the cargo of such vessel must be determined before such vessel or cargo is sunk or destroyed, and that such vessel can not be sunk without notice and without being first summoned to submit to an examination; and in no case can such vessel be sunk unless and until all passengers and crew shall have been removed therefrom and assured safe conduct into some port where they may find shelter and food.

That if under the conditions and limitations of submarine capacity and power passengers and crew can only be accorded the safety of their lifeboats they can be turned adrift only under such conditions as to make it certain that with reasonable diligence and care on their part they can be landed safely in such port. If the condition of the sea or the distance from land is such that said crew and passengers would be subjected to great danger if left to their own lifeboats the right of the belligerent must be limited to the destruction of the contraband cargo on such vessel, leaving the vessel in the hands of the crew to reach a port of safety.

That no belligerent has a right to prohibit any neutral vessel from traveling upon any part of the high seas in carrying on commerce with another neutral in goods not intended for belligerent destination, and no right to exercise any interference except such as may be reasonably necessary to determine the character of the cargo and the destination of the vessel.

That the Government of the United States hereby declares that the firing upon or sinking of any vessel of American registry without notice by any belligerent, or the destruction of such vessel without first providing for the safety of the passengers and crew thereon, or the willful detention of such vessel engaged in trade with other neutral countries, except in so far as such detention may be reasonably necessary to determine the character of the cargo or the destination of the vessel, or any other willful violation of the rights of American ships and American citizens, as herein declared, is an act of war against this country, and will be accepted and regarded as an act of war against the United States by the country so offending; and, thereupon, without further declaration or notice, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to employ the entire naval and military forces of the United States and the resources of the Government to carry on war against the offending country; and to bring the conflict to a successful termination all of the resources of the country are hereby pledged by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, in presenting this resolution I am following a course consistent with my attitude and purpose since the very beginning of this European war. That purpose has been to maintain our neutrality and avoid being drawn into this conflict if it could be done without the surrender of vital American rights or national honor.

We have reached a point to-day where we must either surrender vital American rights, and I think American honor as well, or Germany must surrender her present method of ruthless and indiscriminate submarine warfare against American vessels and American citizens. I am pausing on the brink of this war long enough to allow Germany to withdraw her declaration of unrestricted warfare on neutral ships and neutral citizens. I am allowing her the opportunity to retreat. Without condoning a single past act, I am chalking the deadline and leaving it to her whether she will again cross that line. She can answer by word or act. If she immediately ceases her unlawful assaults upon our vessels and citizens, she can avoid war with us. If she oversteps that line again, she will do so after having measured the consequences, and the war will be of her own choosing. In the meantime we will be continuing our preparation and will lose no point of vantage by a few days' delay in declaring or initiating war.

Mr. President, I have recognized that in a great war like that now raging across the ocean no neutral country could expect to exercise without hindrance or inconvenience every commercial right it enjoyed in times of peace; that nations in the throes of a life and death struggle would on many occasions overstep recognized belligerent rights and infringe upon the rights of neutrals; that there can be no great war without upsetting to a considerable extent the course of trade and other commercial and financial relations of neutrals; and that in the light of the history of all wars we ought to exercise a great degree of charitableness toward these war-maddened nations of Europe.

I have therefore sought on all occasions to keep this country neutral in spirit as well as in conduct. When this war began and the press of the country seemed united in a campaign of denunciation of the whole German people, indicting them as Huns, as savage and remorseless murderers, I felt it my duty to defend them against this wholesale charge of brutality in an address made before the Senate. While I could not condone many of the acts committed, like the shooting to death of a nurse girl, the levying of tribute upon the conquered Belgians, the sinking of the Lusitania, the ruthless sinking of hospital ships, or wanton destruction of homes and household effects of noncombatants, I preferred to place the blame where it rightly belonged, on the shoulders of the officers commanding, rather than upon the German people in whom I had always found a sprit of mildness and sympathy.

I have, rather, charged these things to that false dogma of Prussian militarism inculcated by every commander from the Kaiser down, that militarism must of necessity be austere and merciless, devoid of sympathy or humanity, and governed by the single unswerving purpose to accomplish results, whether such results be achieved by shattering the ranks of an enemy soldiery or striking terror into the hearts of an enemy populace. I have believed, and still believe, that the German soldier who executes these merciless commands has no more heart in the work assigned to him than the executioner who carries out the death sentence of a court; that the relentless spirit of militarism above him, ever bearing upon its banner the edict of immediate death to him who hesitates to obey, has forced every repugnant or heartless deed.

Mr. President, when this war broke out I proposed and supported a measure prohibiting the shipment of arms and ammunition to either belligerent. While recognizing that there were two sides to this great question on its merits, I did not agree with the majority in the Senate that such an embargo would be a breach of either neutrality or of our treaties, and that while the withholding of arms from a weaker or unprepared nation as against a stronger or well prepared country might well be considered an unneutral act, I felt that there was no such disparity in the matter of preparedness or ability to prepare between the great countries engaged in this conflict as to create a moral duty on our part to supply either with the means to destroy the other.

When the differences between this country and Germany on the use of submarines in warfare became acute I was compelled through conviction to disagree with the President and a majority in the Senate in the assertion that the submarine could not under international law be used at all against enemy merchant ships. Although I was but one of a small minority holding this view, and for which I was subjected to no little criticism, I believe that view has since been practically acquiesced in by this country.

So, too, I stood with the few against the many in the Senate in insisting that while the controversy between this country and Germany on the subject of the use of submarines against belligerent vessels was under diplomatic discussion, it was the duty of the American citizens to waive their right to travel on a belligerent war vessel, and that this country should request its citizens to refrain from travel on such belligerent vessels during such negotiations, that the possibility of reaching an agreement might not be jeopardized by any needless act of an American citizen.

Mr. President, I have followed this course and advocated these positions not only because of my conviction that they were sound and right but also because I wished, first, to keep this country at peace with all the warring nations and, second, to maintain an attitude so clearly and unmistakably neutral that she could exert a potent influence in checking this slaughter and be a powerful factor in maintaining the future peace of the world. If I have seemed overlenient or forbearing in case of wanton wrong it has sprung from an earnest desire that this country might remain at peace and that only the gravest and most aggravating cause should lead us from our neutral purpose.

I am not unmindful of, nor do I slight the great and grave provocations which seem to come with ever-increasing frequency and aggravation in the sinking of American vessels not engaged in trade with any belligerent, but carrying on commerce between neutral nations only, without notice, warning, or investigation. So unprovoked have been some of these acts of destruction, in some instances so wanton, like the sinking of our merchant vessels trading only with other neutrals, that I find it difficult to believe that the German people, if they fully understood the circumstances, would uphold the officials of their Government in such reckless assault upon commerce between peaceful and neutral countries. On what ground the German Government can claim that vessels trading only between this country and Holland, Denmark, Sweden, or Norway in goods not intended, directly or indirectly, for the use of a belligerent should be treated as enemy vessels is beyond my comprehension.

There seem to be but two possible explanations of this conduct: Either that official Germany, exasperated at the world sentiment against her, has become so reckless as to look upon all the commercial powers as her enemies or that, being unable to secure from this country that which other belligerents are securing by reason of their ability to command at least the surface of the seas, she believes that with her undersea craft she can better carry out her purpose to isolate Great Britain and cut off her food supply by striking her commerce with this country at its source, and is, therefore, in reality inviting rather than avoiding a war with this country, assuring herself that we have not the equipment to land or support an army in Europe and that in a state of war, and freed from the restraints of neutrality, she can sink American vessels either at our ports or on the high seas and thereby better accomplish her purpose of eliminating Great Britain from the contest by cutting off her food supply. Whatever may be her purposes or motives, it is certain she is sinking our ships which are not engaged in commerce with her enemy. She may feel justified in sinking without notice or warning any belligerent merchant vessel, but I can not understand how she can justify herself in sinking without warning neutral vessels engaged in neutral trade with neutral nations. I can not believe that her own people, if they understood the real situation, would ever back up such an assertion of right, such a wholesale assault upon the commerce of the world.

Now, Mr. President, there can be no such thing as both parties to a war being right. Notwithstanding the fact that the people of each nation may consider their cause just, one or the other must be wrong. If we are right we ought to make the people of the other country—not merely the heads of government, not merely the military caste, but the great people themselves—understand that their cause can not be just. The assertion that "he is thrice armed whose cause is just" loses much of its force if it so happen that his opponent conscientiously believes that cause to be grossly unjust.

I believe the German people—the common people—do not understand our attitude. I want them to understand it. I believe they are laboring under a false conviction that as a Nation we are claiming rights which we do not claim; that they are imbued with a false notion that we as a Nation are insisting upon the right of our merchant ships to deliver without molestation or interference contraband of war to their enemies. I want this country to dispel that false conviction.

Mr. President, I want the fairness and righteousness of our position to be presented to the German people before we either declare war or commit an act which will, in fact, constitute war. I want to put the onus of that war on the other country. If, in connection with what we concede to be belligerent rights, we send this declaration of our own unquestioned international rights to Germany, we put it up to her to decide whether she wishes to make an unjust war on us. Under this resolution we need not even wait for a reply. One single act on her part in defiance of these sacred rights of this neutral country will be answer sufficient for us.

I have an abiding hope that if we pass this resolution in this form there will never be another American vessel sunk without notice, and never another American vessel engaged in trade with neutrals sunk either with or without notice; and that we shall secure a recognition of these, our vital rights, without plunging into the vortex of this conflict.

But it is said we have already not only asserted these rights but declared we would hold the Imperial German Government to a strict accountability in case of her violation of them, and she has answered by a still more reckless disregard of them. We are compelled to admit this is true. But, Mr. President, the previous assertion of these American rights in defense of which war would be justifiable has been so associated and bound up with assertions of other rights, for the breach of which we would not go to war, and our course has been so uncertain that not only our own people but the people of other countries might well believe that we have waived some of them, and I therefore think we ought to redeclare in unmistakable language not all of our neutral rights but only those we hold to be so vital and their violation such an assault upon the honor of our country that we will back them with the blood and treasure of the Nation. I want the dead line between peace and war to be laid with precision.

I admit, Mr. President, that some of the acts committed by the central powers upon American vessels and American citizens can not be differentiated from war, and we may properly and justly accept them as war, but I can not agree that war actually exists between this country and any belligerent to-day. It takes two parties to make war, and so far we have not made it. I will also admit that the promulgation of an order by the German Government declaring a vast section of the open sea to be a war zone, and that she would destroy any vessel, neutral or belligerent, passing through or into such zone, without notice and without reference to its destination, operates in its effect as a blockade of our own ports, and thereby treats us as a belligerent, and, so treated, we may with perfect propriety and justice, so far as the other country is concerned, accept the belligerency which she has enforced upon us.

But, Mr. President, I am considering the sentiment of this country. If we are to get into this war, I should prefer to have back of it the sentiment of 100 per cent rather than of 80 per cent of its people. If we declare war against Germany to-day, we shall run counter to the sentiment and wishes of a very considerable portion of our people, as is evidenced by the vast number of antiwar telegrams, resolutions, and petitions. If, on the other hand, we declare the dead line between peace and war—which we have not yet done—if we declare that the first attempt to now destroy an American vessel without notice, or the willful destruction of an American life on such vessel, in violation of our somewhat revised declarations, will visit upon the head of the offending nation the might of our war power, and Germany then deliberately steps across that line, and by so doing declares her purpose to force us into the conflict, the American pacifist will then not have a single leg to stand on, and we shall have back of our war a united, aggressive American spirit.

But, suppose we should pass this resolution and Germany should answer, "I shall in the future, so far as American vessels and citizens are concerned, conduct my submarine warfare in accordance with your views," would we then proceed to declare war? And, if we do not, would we insist that we have had a war with Germany? I know that there are a great many of our citizens who believe that we should make common cause with the entente powers, without regard to any specific act of Germany against us; that the allies are fighting the battle of humanity and progress; that it is the final struggle between merciless militarism and freedom, and that we ought not to stand idly by while other nations of the world are pouring out their blood in lavish currents to free Europe and the world from the ever-impending danger of annihilation by the demon of war. But, however this may appeal to many, I am satisfied, Mr. President, that the vast majority of the people of this country are not impressed with the idea that such a situation in reality confronts our people or the world, and that, therefore, they will justify our entering into this war only upon the grounds that it is imposed upon us by the German Government, and we are compelled to enter it in defense of vital American rights.

Mr. President, I have assured the people of my State that, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the United States Senate, I would do everything in my power compatible with the honor of our country to keep our people out of this most savage and bloody conflict. In presenting this resolution I am making a final effort, or, perhaps, I might better say, giving the great central powers the opportunity to avoid a war with us. I believe that if we should pass this resolution, or one similar to it, the answer might be peace. If not, then Germany has preferred war with us and must take the consequences.

But this country can not stand and will not stand for a continuance of present conditions. While we have committed no act of war against any belligerent, the declaration of a belligerent that she will sink any American ship within a certain zone without notice and without any attempt to ascertain either its cargo or its destination, operates as a blockade of our ports even against trade with neutral countries. And her acts in destroying the lives of American citizens on American ships without notice or investigation are acts of war against us; and if I am compelled to vote on that issue my vote must record the truth, that war is being made on us. But, Mr. President, I feel that it is for our own interest that we now draw the line between peace and war and leave it to Germany to cross that line.

Mr. President, if this last effort of mine to avoid conflict shall fail, if the majority of Congress feel that acts already committed demand an immediate appeal to arms, I shall acquiesce in that judgment and support my Government in its every war need; and, reluctant as I am to get into this conflict, if the decision of this country shall be for war, I shall never vote to sheathe the sword until peace, honorable and just, shall be restored to her throne of tranquillity, and her sovereignty guarded and assured in the future by all the great nations of the world, by the very armies that have razed her temples and ravished her realms.

I shall, Mr. President, submit this resolution for a vote of the Senate. I have little hope that it will pass, as I understand very well the present sentiment of this body. The fact that it may not pass, however, does not change my conviction that it ought to pass. If it does not, there is but one thing left for me to do, and that is to vote in favor of the resolution reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I shall do that rather than for a single moment to allow the present conditions to remain unchallenged and unacted upon.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, while I am most emphatically and sincerely opposed to taking any step that will force our country into the useless and senseless war now being waged in Europe, yet if this resolution passes I shall not permit my feeling of opposition to its passage to interfere in any way with my duty either as a Senator or as a citizen in bringing success and victory to American arms. I am bitterly opposed to my country entering the war, but if, notwithstanding my opposition, we do enter it, all of my energy and all of my power will be behind our flag in carrying it on to victory.

The resolution now before the Senate is a declaration of war. Before taking this momentous step, and while standing on the brink of this terrible vortex, we ought to pause and calmly and judiciously consider the terrible consequences of the step we are about to take. We ought to consider likewise the route we have recently traveled and ascertain whether we have reached our present position in a way that is compatible with the neutral position which we claimed to occupy at the beginning and through the various stages of this unholy and unrighteous war.

No close student of recent history will deny that both Great Britain and Germany have, on numerous occasions since the beginning of the war, flagrantly violated in the most serious manner the rights of neutral vessels and neutral nations under existing international law as recognized up to the beginning of this war by the civilized world.

The reason given by the President in asking Congress to declare war against Germany is that the German Government has declared certain war zones, within which, by the use of submarines, she sinks, without notice, American ships and destroys American lives.

Let us trace briefly the origin and history of these so-called war zones. The first war zone was declared by Great Britain. She gave us and the world notice of it on the 4th day of November, 1914. The zone became effective November 5, 1914, the next day after the notice was given. This zone so declared by Great Britain covered the whole of the North Sea. The order establishing it sought to close the north of Scotland route around the British Isles to Denmark, Holland, Norway, Sweden, and the Baltic Sea. The decree of establishment drew an arbitrary line from the Hebrides Islands along the Scottish coast to Iceland, and warned neutral shipping that it would cross those lines at its peril, and ordered that ships might go to Holland and other neutral nations by taking the English Channel route through the Strait of Dover.

The first German war zone was declared on the 4th day of February, 1915, just three months after the British war zone was declared. Germany gave 15 days' notice of the establishment of her zone, which became effective on the 18th day of February, 1915. The German war zone covered the English Channel and the high sea waters around the British Isles. It sought to close the English Channel route around the British Isles to Holland, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and the Baltic Sea. The German war zone decreed that neutral vessels would be exposed to danger in the English Channel route, but that the route around the north of Scotland and in the eastern part of the North Sea, in a strip 30 miles wide along the Dutch coast, would be free from danger.

It will thus be seen that the British Government declared the north of Scotland route into the Baltic Sea as dangerous and the English Channel route into the Baltic Sea as safe.

The German Government in its order did exactly the reverse. It declared the north of Scotland route into the Baltic Sea as safe and the English Channel route into the Baltic Sea as dangerous.

The order of the British Government declaring the North Sea as a war zone used the following language:

The British Admiralty gives notice that the waters of the North Sea must be considered a military area. Within this area merchant shipping of all kinds, traders of all countries, fishing craft, and other vessels will be exposed to the gravest danger from mines it has been necessary to lay.

The German Government, by its order declaring its war zone around the south of England, declared that the order would be made effective by the use of submarines.

Thus we have the two declarations of the two Governments, each declaring a military zone and warning neutral shipping from going into the prohibited area. England sought to make her order effective by the use of submerged mines. Germany sought to make her order effective by the use of submarines. Both of these orders were illegal and contrary to all international law as well as the principles of humanity. Under international law no belligerent Government has the right to place submerged mines in the high seas. Neither has it any right to take human life without notice by the use of submarines. If there is any difference on the ground of humanity between these two instrumentalities, it is certainly in favor of the submarines. The submarine can exercise some degree of discretion and judgment. The submerged mine always destroys without notice, friend and foe alike, guilty and innocent the same. In carrying out these two policies, both Great Britain and Germany have sunk American ships and destroyed American lives without provocation and without notice. There have been more ships sunk and more American lives lost from the action of submarines than from English mines in the North Sea; for the simple reason that we finally acquiesced in the British war zone and kept our ships out of it, while in the German war zone we have refused to recognize its legality and have not kept either our ships or our citizens out of its area. If American ships had gone into the British war zone in defiance of Great Britain's order, as they have gone into the German war zone in defiance of the German Government's order, there would have been many more American lives lost and many more American ships sunk by the instrumentality of the mines than the instrumentality of the submarines.

We have in the main complied with the demands made by Great Britain. Our ships have followed the instructions of the British Government in going not only to England but to the neutral nations of the world, and in thus complying with the British order American ships going to Holland, Denmark, Norway, and Sweden have been taken by British officials into British ports, and their cargoes inspected and examined. All the mails we have carried even to neutral countries have been opened and censored, and oftentimes the entire cargo confiscated by the Government. Nothing has been permitted to pass to even the most neutral nations except after examination and with the permission of the officials of the British Government.

I have outlined the beginning of the controversy. I have given in substance the orders of both of these great Governments that constituted the beginning of our controversy with each. There have been other orders made by both Governments subsequent to the ones I have given that interfered with our rights as a neutral Nation, but these two that I have outlined constitute the origin of practically the entire difficulty, and subsequent orders have only been modifications and reproductions of those I have already mentioned. It is unnecessary to cite authority to show that both of these orders declaring military zones were illegal and contrary to international law. It is sufficient to say that our Government has officially declared both of them to be illegal and has officially protested against both of them.

The only difference is that in the case of Germany we have persisted in our protest, while in the case of England we have submitted. What was our duty as a Government and what were our rights when we were confronted with these extraordinary orders declaring these military zones? First, we could have defied both of them and could have gone to war against both of these nations for this violation of international law and interference with our neutral rights. Second, we had the technical right to defy one and to acquiesce in the other. Third, we could, while denouncing them both as illegal, have acquiesced in them both and thus remained neutral with both sides, although not agreeing with either as to the righteousness of their respective orders. We could have said to American shipowners that, while these orders are both contrary to international law and are both unjust, we do not believe that the provocation is sufficient to cause us to go to war for the defense of our rights as a neutral nation, and, therefore, American ships and American citizens will go into these zones at their own peril and risk. Fourth, we might have declared an embargo against the shipping from American ports of any merchandise to either one of these Governments that persisted in maintaining its military zone. We might have refused to permit the sailing of any ship from any American port to either of these military zones. In my judgment, if we had pursued this course, the zones would have been of short duration. England would have been compelled to take her mines out of the North Sea in order to get any supplies from our country. When her mines were taken out of the North Sea then the German ports upon the North Sea would have been accessible to American shipping and Germany would have been compelled to cease her submarine warfare in order to get any supplies from our Nation into German North Sea ports.

There are a great many American citizens who feel that we owe it as a duty to humanity to take part in this war. Many instances of cruelty and inhumanity can be found on both sides. Men are often biased in their judgment on account of their sympathy and their interests. To my mind, what we ought to have maintained from the beginning was the strictest neutrality. If we had done this I do not believe we would have been on the verge of war at the present time. We had a right as a nation, if we desired, to cease at any time to be neutral. We had a technical right to respect the English war zone and to disregard the German war zone, but we could not do that and be neutral. I have no quarrel to find with the man who does not desire our country to remain neutral. While many such people are moved by selfish motives and hopes of gain, I have no doubt but that in a great many instances, through what I believe to be a misunderstanding of the real condition, there are many honest, patriotic citizens who think we ought to engage in this war and who are behind the President in his demand that we should declare war against Germany. I think such people err in judgment and to a great extent have been misled as to the real history and the true facts by the almost unanimous demand of the great combination of wealth that has a direct financial interest in our participation in the war. We have loaned many hundreds of millions of dollars to the allies in this controversy. While such action was legal and countenanced by international law, there is no doubt in my mind but the enormous amount of money loaned to the allies in this country has been instrumental in bringing about a public sentiment in favor of our country taking a course that would make every bond worth a hundred cents on the dollar and making the payment of every debt certain and sure. Through this instrumentality and also through the instrumentality of others who have not only made millions out of the war in the manufacture of munitions, etc., and who would expect to make millions more if our country can be drawn into the catastrophe, a large number of the great newspapers and news agencies of the country have been controlled and enlisted in the greatest propaganda that the world has ever known, to manufacture sentiment in favor of war. It is now demanded that the American citizens shall be used as insurance policies to guarantee the safe delivery of munitions of war to belligerent nations. The enormous profits of munition manufacturers, stockbrokers, and bond dealers must be still further increased by our entrance into the war. This has brought us to the present moment, when Congress, urged by the President and backed by the artificial sentiment, is about to declare war and engulf our country in the greatest holocaust that the world has ever known.

In showing the position of the bondholder and the stockbroker I desire to read an extract from a letter written by a member of the New York Stock Exchange to his customers. This writer says:

Regarding the war as inevitable, Wall Street believes that it would be preferable to this uncertainty about the actual date of its commencement. Canada and Japan are at war, and are more prosperous than ever before. The popular view is that stocks would have a quick, clear, sharp reaction immediately upon outbreak of hostilities, and that then they would enjoy an old-fashioned bull market such as followed the outbreak of war with Spain in 1898. The advent of peace would force a readjustment of commodity prices and would probably mean a postponement of new enterprises. As peace negotiations would be long drawn out, the period of waiting and uncertainty for business would be long. If the United States does not go to war it is nevertheless good opinion that the preparedness program will compensate in good measure for the loss of the stimulus of actual war.

Here we have the Wall Street view. Here we have the man representing the class of people who will be made prosperous should we become entangled in the present war, who have already made millions of dollars, and who will make many hundreds of millions more if we get into the war. Here we have the cold-blooded proposition that war brings prosperity to that class of people who are within the viewpoint of this writer. He expresses the view, undoubtedly, of Wall Street, and of thousands of men elsewhere, who see only dollars coming to them through the handling of stocks and bonds that will be necessary in case of war. "Canada and Japan," he says, "are at war, and are more prosperous than ever before."

To whom does war bring prosperity? Not to the soldier who for the munificent compensation of $16 per month shoulders his musket and goes into the trench, there to shed his blood and to die if necessary; not to the broken-hearted widow who waits for the return of the mangled body of her husband; not to the mother who weeps at the death of her brave boy; not to the little children who shiver with cold; not to the babe who suffers from hunger; nor to the millions of mothers and daughters who carry broken hearts to their graves. War brings no prosperity to the great mass of common and patriotic citizens. It increases the cost of living of those who toil and those who already must strain every effort to keep soul and body together. War brings prosperity to the stock gambler on Wall Street—to those who are already in possession of more wealth than can be realized or enjoyed. Again this writer says that if we can not get war, "it is nevertheless good opinion that the preparedness program will compensate in good measure for the loss of the stimulus of actual war." That is, if we can not get war, let us go as far in that direction as possible. If we can not get war, let us cry for additional ships, additional guns, additional munitions, and everything else that will have a tendency to bring us as near as possible to the verge of war. And if war comes do such men as these shoulder the musket and go into the trenches?

Their object in having war and in preparing for war is to make money. Human suffering and the sacrifice of human life are necessary, but Wall Street considers only the dollars and the cents. The men who do the fighting, the people who make the sacrifices, are the ones who will not be counted in the measure of this great prosperity that he depicts. The stock brokers would not, of course, go to war, because the very object they have in bringing on the war is profit, and therefore they must remain in their Wall Street offices in order to share in that great prosperity which they say war will bring. The volunteer officer, even the drafting officer, will not find them. They will be concealed in their palatial offices on Wall Street, sitting behind mahogany desks, covered up with clipped coupons—coupons soiled with the sweat of honest toil, coupons stained with mothers' tears, coupons dyed in the lifeblood of their fellow men.

We are taking a step to-day that is fraught with untold danger. We are going into war upon the command of gold. We are going to run the risk of sacrificing millions of our countrymen's lives in order that other countrymen may coin their lifeblood into money. And even if we do not cross the Atlantic and go into the trenches, we are going to pile up a debt that the toiling masses that shall come many generations after us will have to pay. Unborn millions will bend their backs in toil in order to pay for the terrible step we are now about to take. We are about to do the bidding of wealth's terrible mandate. By our act we will make millions of our countrymen suffer, and the consequences of it may well be that millions of our brethren must shed their lifeblood, millions of broken-hearted women must weep, millions of children must suffer with cold, and millions of babes must die from hunger, and all because we want to preserve the commercial right of American citizens to deliver munitions of war to belligerent nations.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator that I prefer not to yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. Of course I can not interrupt under those circumstances.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I know that I am powerless to stop it. I know that this war madness has taken possession of the financial and political powers of our country. I know that nothing I can say will stay the blow that is soon to fall. I feel that we are committing a sin against humanity and against our countrymen. I would like to say to this war god, You shall not coin into gold the lifeblood of my brethren. I would like to prevent this terrible catastrophe from falling upon my people. I would be willing to surrender my own life if I could cause this awful cup to pass. I charge no man here with a wrong motive, but it seems to me that this war craze has robbed us of our judgment. I wish we might delay our action until reason could again be enthroned in the brain of man. I feel that we are about to put the dollar sign upon the American flag.

I have no sympathy with the military spirit that dominates the Kaiser and his advisers. I do not believe that they represent the heart of the great German people. I have no more sympathy with the submarine policy of Germany than I have with the mine-laying policy of England. I have heard with rejoicing of the overthrow of the Czar of Russia and the movement in that great country toward the establishment of a government where the common people will have their rights, liberty, and freedom respected. I hope and pray that a similar revolution may take place in Germany, that the Kaiser may be overthrown, and that on the ruins of his military despotism may be established a German republic, where the great German people may work out their world destiny. The working out of that problem is not an American burden. We ought to remember the advice of the Father of our Country and keep out of entangling alliances. Let Europe solve her problems as we have solved ours. Let Europe bear her burdens as we have borne ours. In the greatest war of our history and at the time it occurred, the greatest war in the world's history, we were engaged in solving an American problem. We settled the question of human slavery and washed our flag clean by the sacrifice of human blood. It was a great problem and a great burden, but we solved it ourselves. Never once did we think of asking Europe to take part in its solution. Never once did any European nation undertake to settle the great question. We solved it, and history has rendered a unanimous verdict that we solved it right. The troubles of Europe ought to be settled by Europe, and wherever our sympathies may lie, disagreeing as we do, we ought to remain absolutely neutral and permit them to settle their questions without our interference. We are now the greatest neutral nation. Upon the passage of this resolution we will have joined Europe in the great catastrophe and taken America into entanglements that will not end with this war, but will live and bring their evil influences upon many generations yet unborn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the substitute offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER].

Mr. GRONNA obtained the floor.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. REED. I understood I have the floor unless we were going to vote.

Mr. GRONNA. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator if he wishes to speak now.

Mr. REED. It will take me just a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota yields to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator. Mr. President, I hope the junior Senator from Nebraska will not leave the Chamber.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. PITTMAN. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] is unavoidably detained from the Senate on account of busniess and other matters.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness.

Mr. MARTIN. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] is detained at home by serious illness in his family.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. GOFF], who is unavoidably detained on account of illness.

Mr. REED. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. He is confined to his home by illness, as he has been for a number of weeks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it has been no part of my purpose to participate in this debate, but a statement or series of statements made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] seem to me to demand instant repudiation. I need not say to that Senator or to the Members of this body that I hold the Senator from Nebraska in the very highest personal regard and esteem, and because of that regard and esteem I shall not permit myself to characterize his speech as I believe it ought to be characterized. There are men in this world of high intelligence who become so obsessed by certain ideas that they permit them to color all other objects coming within their mental vision. The Senator from Nebraska, I fear, is so obsessed with a fear of "money" and of "profits" and of "fortunes" that all that it is necessary to suggest is that some wealthy concern may have an interest, remote, contingent, or direct, in the subject matter under consideration in order to confuse his mental vision. So we find the Senator here to-day reading a letter which he says comes from some unnamed Wall Street man. The letter purports to be nothing save a business man's view as to the business outcome in the event of possible hostilities. Because of that letter the Senator makes the statements which I propose to challenge. He said:

We are taking a step to-day that is fraught with untold danger. We are going into war upon the command of gold. We are going to run the risk of sacrificing millions of our countrymen's lives in order that other countrymen may coin their lifeblood into money.

Mr. President, that is an indictment of the President of the United States. That is an indictment of the Congress of the United States. That is an indictment of the American people. That is an indictment of truth, and it is not the truth. The Senator continues:

By our act we will make millions of our countrymen suffer, and the consequences of it may well be that millions of our brethren must shed their lifeblood, millions of broken-hearted women must weep, millions of children must suffer with cold, and millions of babes must die from hunger, and all because we want to preserve the commercial right of American citizens to deliver munitions of war to belligerent nations.

Mr. President, that is another indictment of the President of the United States, of the Congress of the United States, of the American people, and of truth and fact. The Senator continues:

I know that I am powerless to stop it. I know that this war madness has taken possession of the financial and political powers of our country.

And he continues:

I would like to say to this war god, "You shall not coin into gold the lifeblood of my brethren."

Then he adds:

I feel we are about to put the dollar sign upon the American flag.

Ah, Mr. President, I am sorry from my heart that such a statement should have been made at this time by an American citizen in the highest body of the American Congress. If that be not giving aid and comfort to the enemy on the very eve of the opening of hostilities then I do not know what would bring comfort to the heart of a Hapsburg or a Hohenzollern. If that be not treason it takes on a character and guise that is so near to treason that the enemies of America will gain from it much consolation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If it be not treason it grazes the edge of treason.

Mr. REED. As the Senator from Mississippi says with his usual terseness, if it be not treason it grazes the edge of treason.

Sir, this war is not being waged over dollars. It is not being waged over commerce. It is not being waged over profits and losses. It is a war for the maintenance of the sovereign rights of the American Republic and for the preservation of American dignity in the councils of the nations of the earth.

There was a time when Great Britain sought to levy a little tax on tea. The tax amounted to nothing from the dollar-and-cent standpoint. There were men then in old Boston town who said they would not pay that tax. If my friend had been there then I have no doubt he would have said to the Boston tea party, "You are waging war to save a few paltry dollars; you should not wage war for money; you would sacrifice human life to save a little tax." But there were patriots in that day who knew that a great principle was involved. They knew it was not a question of dollars. They knew that liberty was involved. They knew that back of the taxgatherer stood the power of a great country, that proposed to lay its heavy hand upon the liberties of this people; and so those Boston men went forth not to resist the tax, but to resist tyranny; not to save money, but to pour out their lifeblood that liberty might live on this side of the Atlantic.

And to-day, as the President of the United States calls our country to arms, he does not do so because of the loss of a few paltry dollars. He calls us to arms because the life of this Republic, its honor and its integrity, have been assailed. He calls us to arms in order that the rights of the American Nation upon the high seas shall not be sacrificed. He calls us to arms to the end that neutral nations, great and small, shall not be crushed beneath the iron heel of that military despotism which to-day threatens not alone the civilization of Europe but of the world at large.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I doubt very much whether anything from me is necessary in reply to what the Senator from Missouri has said. I want to say just a few words, however.

In the first place, I want to deny most emphatically that there is anything in the remarks which I made that by any construction of the English language can be construed as an attack or reflection upon the President of the United States. What I have said will be printed, I presume, as I said it, and I will invite any man to make any examination and find anything in it anywhere that can be considered as a reflection upon the President or anybody else.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska whether he did or did not say he feared we were about to put the dollar mark upon the flag?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, sir; I said that. Is that any reflection on the President? That is what I believe. I believe it.

Mr. JAMES. It is a reflection on the country.

Mr. NORRIS. No; it is not a reflection on the country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator say that the remark is no reflection on the President or Congress or the people of the United States, charging them with baseness, paltryness, and selfishness and meanness? Does he stand here and say he meant nothing by it?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I meant what I said. I am not apologizing for what I did say.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Just wait a minute now. The Senators ought to realize that when they map out a course that to them seems proper, if somebody else disagrees with it and expresses himself in regard to it he has the same right to his judgment and the same right to his opinion that every other Senator has.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment I will yield.

Mr. JAMES. Let me ask the Senator a question.

Mr. NORRIS. Just a minute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska declines to yield for the present.

Mr. NORRIS. Just let me finish now. I believe myself that we would not be on the verge of war now if it were not for the influence of money, and that is the idea I expressed. I expressly said that I did not question any man's motive. I believe that the country is war mad now. I said then, and I repeat it now, that notwithstanding the fact that I am opposed to this resolution, when it is passed and war is declared there will be no man here who will go further or sacrifice more to carry our flag to victory than I.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. You will have the dollar mark also.

Mr. NORRIS. It may be that I will. There are a good many influences, I will say to the Senator, that I have heard him speak of, and every other Senator here. Wealth has had its influence. It is the greatest power in the world, and I believe that it is almost unamimous in favor of war. That does not mean that because a man is wealthy he is not patriotic; and I never expressed such an idea. I never intended to say and I did not say anything of that kind; but the great power of wealth has done more to bring us to our present position than any other; and men may be influenced by it unconsciously, I realize.

Mr. JAMES. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. NORRIS. I will first yield to the Senator from Missouri, if he wants to ask me a question.

Mr. REED. The Senator used the expression:

I feel that we are about to put the dollar sign upon the American flag.

I read from the Senator's manuscript, as I also read the other statements purporting to come from him from his manuscript.

Mr. NORRIS. I have not denied making that statement. I did make it, and I do say that I feel that way.

Mr. REED. The Senator, of course, means by that that by entering this war we are about to put the dollar sign upon the American flag.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator will just wait a moment. The Senator must not ask me a question and then put the answer in my mouth.

Mr. REED. No; I do not desire to do that.

Mr. NORRIS. Then he must not undertake to do it. I said I believed we were about to put the dollar sign on the American flag.

Mr. REED. By entering this war. That is what you meant.

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. REED. What did you mean, then?

Mr. NORRIS. No; by the passage of the resolution.

Mr. REED. That is entering the war.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; you can put it that way.

Mr. REED. That is what I said.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator can not put a construction on it to mean that when we get into the war it would not be my duty and every other man's duty to do everything we could to bring it to a successful result.

Mr. REED. If by entering the war we are about to put the dollar sign on the American flag and the President directs us to enter the war, does he not thereby direct us to put the dollar sign on the American flag, and does the Senator regard that kind of a statement as complimentary to the President and not as grossly insulting the President?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, of course the President or anybody else can put what construction he pleases on it. I do not believe in the ordinary construction of the English language he has a right to put any such construction on it.

Mr. JAMES. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. Just let me finish and then I will yield. I do not cast any reflection, in my judgment, upon any person. I did not charge anyone with being unpatriotic. I believed, and I do believe now and I repeat it, that there is a war craze; that men have lost their judgment, and that we are going into war without reason. Now, I have a right to that opinion. I have a right to express it. If my language is not as beautiful as some others and some one wants to put a misconstruction on it that is his privilege.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I concede the Senator's right, and I have always conceded the right of any Senator to say that he wants to escape this war. I concede his right to vote against it. What I am challenging is a statement being sent out to the world that this war is being waged for cold dollars.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I say the Senator owes it to himself, to his State, to his country to make his language so clear at this moment that a doubt can not exist.

Mr. NORRIS. I have made my statement as clear, Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Anything else is dishonorable to the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. When American lives were lost or American ships sunk by English mines or German submarines it was done in an effort to make money. I am not complaining of the men who wanted to take the risk; that was their privilege; but, Mr. President, it was always commercial. Everything connected with it was commercial.

Mr. REED. Do you think that the woman and babe who were drowned going to the father and husband were there for the purpose of making money?

Mr. NORRIS. No; there was not a mother and babe drowned on an American ship.

Mr. REED. There were an American woman and an American babe drowned, according to my information.

Mr. NORRIS. If we had done like the English colonies we would not permit American women and American babies to sail on ships of any nationality into the war zone. That is the rule that Canada has, and one that she enforces.

Mr. JAMES. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. NORRIS. All right; I yield.

Mr. JAMES. The Senator says——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Canada and the other colonies are engaged in the war.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator interrupts to say something when I had yielded to the Senator from Kentucky. Of course, that is contrary to the rules of the Senate but it is all right for the Senator from Mississippi to do it. As I understand it, Canada will not permit Canadian women and Canadian children to sail even on English vessels from a Canadian port to an English port at this time.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator a question. He says that the action that is about to be taken here by the United States Congress would place the dollar mark upon the American flag, and yet he asserts that that is no reflection upon the President, the Congress, or the country. What would the Senator think if I should say to him that those who battle with him against the passage of this resolution were seeking to place the picture of the Kaiser upon the American flag? Would the Senator think that that was any reflection upon him and those associated with him?

Mr. NORRIS. I would, of course, know it was wrong.

Mr. JAMES. Certainly the Senator would.

Mr. NORRIS. And if the Senator said it I would not pay any attention to it. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Just one moment. The Senator will suspend. Occupants of the galleries must preserve order. Otherwise the Chair will be compelled to have the galleries cleared.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. I trust that the rule will be strictly enforced that Senators must address the Chair and obtain permission from the Chair to interrupt.

The PRESIDENT per tempore. The Chair has endeavored to enforce the rule——

Mr. GALLINGER. I hope the rule will be enforced——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And the Chair will insist on its enforcement hereafter.

Mr. GALLINGER. Otherwise we shall have a town meeting here.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, if the Senator from New Hampshire is referring to me, I will enlighten him by saying that I did request and, after several trials, got permission through the Chair to interrupt.

The Senator from Nebraska says that he would not pay any attention had I said what I have just suggested, but I will say to the Senator that, while he would not pay any attention to it, his statement which has been made here and his speech which he has just delivered will be paid attention to by the American people, and particularly by the people of Nebraska, whom he pretends to represent.

Mr. NORRIS. I do hope the people of Nebraska will pay attention to what I have said. Let me again now repeat that what I have said stands for itself, in my judgment. I have not said anything that will compare with what the Senator from Missouri has said in regard to me.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Missouri quoted you.

Mr. NORRIS. I have not, I know, intended to cast any reflection upon any living being. I do not believe that anything which I have said will be so construed; but if it is, I can not help it. Reflections, however, have been cast here to-day upon me which are ten million times greater than anything I have said. I am not going to take them seriously, because I believe, as I have said, that there is at this time a feeling controlling not only the country, but Members of this body, by which men are not in full possession of all their reasoning faculties. The Senator from Missouri has said something that at some time he will regret, I believe.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I am not going to resent it; I am not going to say anything in regard to it, because I have too high a regard for the Senator, and I have too high a regard for the Members of this body to bring it in here and now. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska has just stated that the Members of the Senate have lost their reasoning powers, or rather that they were affected——

Mr. WILLIAMS. All except him.

Mr. POMERENE. Up to date about three hundred American men, women, and children have lost their lives as the result of Germany's submarine warfare.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator——

Mr. NORRIS. All right.

Mr. POMERENE. How many more American lives must be lost before he shall be willing to vote that there is a state of war in existence, or vote to take measures for the defense of our people?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am glad to answer the Senator's question. I outlined in my remarks what I believed would have brought about a complete avoidance of the present difficulty, and if the Senator from Ohio had done me the honor to remain in the Chamber while I was speaking he would have found what my ideas were. I believe the Senator said there were 300 American lives lost. Mr. President, if any Government were seeking out Americans with the intention of killing them because they were American citizens, I should be willing to go to war, if necessary, when the first one was killed. That has not been the case as to a single American life lost, either by British mines or German submarine. Neither one of them was hunting Americans; neither one of them desired to kill American citizens; neither one desired to destroy American property; but they did it because it was incidental to what they conceived to be their right or what they claimed to be their right against their enemy.

In Mexico we have had more than 300 people killed, not incidentally in a war or quarrel with somebody else, but because they were Americans. They were hunted down and killed because they were Americans.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. NORRIS. I again yield for a question.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may answer the last suggestion of the Senator I shall be glad to ask the Senator a further question.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, if the Senator wants to do that, and I shall not lose the floor by yielding, I have no objection to his doing so.

Mr. POMERENE. If I may do so, I will say the Senator ought to be content to settle our difficulties with Germany first.

Mr. NORRIS. I am.

Mr. POMERENE. And later on we shall take up the other proposition. I think Senators can differentiate between the acts of a responsible Government like Germany and the acts of an irresponsible mob in Mexico. I believe I can, even if I have in part lost my reasoning powers.

Mr. NORRIS. And so can I, even though I do not have the same mental ability which the Senator from Ohio has.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh——

Mr. NORRIS. But the Senator——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Nebraska yielded to the Senator from Ohio, and he must not interrupt him and allow him to remain on the floor. If the Senator from Nebraska objects to yielding further to the Senator from Ohio, the Chair will withhold that privilege.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to yielding to the Senator from Ohio, but I do not want to lose the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the Senator from Nebraska will kindly address the Chair before he interferes with the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I want to make a suggestion in reference to the manner in which these Americans have been killed. The Senator from Nebraska says that these Americans were not willfully killed. Herr Zimmermann the other day said that they were incidentally killed. Whether that be true or not it is not necessary to discuss; I will assume that they were incidentally killed; but it was in violation of the law of the seas. Some of these men lost their lives after Germany had declared that all ships within a proscribed zone would be sunk. The Senator from Nebraska is a lawyer, and he knows quite well that if I should purposely shoot at him with malice aforethought and incidentally killed somebody else in his vicinity it would be murder. Just so it is when it comes to this mode of submarine warfare.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They killed them premeditatedly and purposely and declared the intention to do so beforehand.

Mr. POMERENE. Certainly. If they had aimed to kill a British officer and had, in the performance of an act which was itself illegal, incidentally killed an American, it would have been an offense against us; but Germany has declared that she will sink any vessel that goes into the proscribed zone whether it be belligerent or neutral. Now, does the Senator from Nebraska feel that we must thus submit to this outlaw on the high seas?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator has at last propounded his question. It is the same one which he previously asked, and I give the same answer. If the Senator had honored me with his presence in the Chamber when I was making my remarks he would have heard my answer to his question. I gave then my ideas, and I do not intend to now repeat them.

I want to refer to what the Senator says about shooting at one man and killing another. It is true, if the first act was done without right and was illegal, and they killed the wrong person, they are guilty of a crime; but it is a different crime in that case. The Senator from Ohio smiles at that, but if he will take the statutes of his own State and read the difference between manslaughter and the various degrees of murder he will find that the elements which constitute the difference are specifically defined and were defined under the common law of England. There always has been a difference. It must be said in favor of both England and Germany that they were not hunting out Americans to kill them. I think Senators who do not agree with me have the right to their opinions. Both England and Germany would have been glad if they could have destroyed their enemy or the ship or cargo they were about to destroy without injury to Americans. But, Mr. President, another thing the Senator assumes is that I am defending that action. Again, if the Senator had been here when I made my remarks he would have found out that I nowhere, at no time, defended it. I have denounced it as illegal and contrary to international law.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator if he desires to interrupt me again.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not mean to say the Senator is defending that act, but I do mean to say that he is assaulting the American people.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, I regret, Mr. President, very gravely that the Senator should have that opinion. I regret more than I can say that he should have that opinion of me. As I view it, it is absolutely unfounded. I have said nothing that is an assault on the American people, and I do not intend to say anything that is an assault on them. I think as much of the American people as does the Senator from Ohio. It seems to me it is only an illustration that applies to me and to the Senator from Ohio and to all of us, just as it does to all the people, that the excitement of the day has probably led us astray in our judgment from where we would have been if there had been nothing but calmness.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Ohio smiles at that. He does not realize, of course, that he is prejudiced or that he is biased or that all of this great cry for war has had any influence on him; but I believe it has, and I mean no reflection on him when I say that. He thinks it has had some effect on me. I hope he does not intend to reflect on me because I do not agree with him in his view of the proposition. I hope it has not come to this, that a man in a legislative body must absolutely, because the majority is so very great against him, bow his head in silence and obey every mandate that majority wants to put across without a word or without any objection. It may be, and probably would be in most cases, that the majority would be right; it is a good thing for the majority to rule, and I want it to rule; but there are some rights that even ordinary people who do not belong to the majority have, and they ought to be respected in maintaining those rights. I do not believe that there has been any justification for the insinuations made by the various Senators here on what I have said.

I now yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator a question for historical information. Of course, the Senator thinks that Senators have insinuated things against him, but he does not think he has insinuated anything against us when he has charged that we have been influenced by dollars and wealth in what we are about to do. But the question I want to ask the Senator for historical information is this: He has carefully and solicitously coupled England with Germany in connection with the murder of American citizens. Now, historically speaking, I have no recollection of any American who has lost his life by the act of Great Britain—that is, by the direction of the Government of Great Britain, at any rate—while those American citizens who have lost their lives by the action of Germany have lost them by the direction of the Government of Germany. When and where has such a thing occurred, and what is the name of any American citizen that England has murdered?

Mr. NORRIS. Let me answer the question. Mr. President, in the first place, there might be some ground for argument, but I am not going to contradict the Senator that when a life is lost by a submarine it is the act of a Government, and that the Government commands it. A Government, of course, is responsible for all the acts of its commanders, whether it has issued a direct command or not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me one moment right there, does the Senator deny that the German Government issued orders to its officers of submarines to kill and sink without warning even American ships in that zone?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not deny that; I not only do not deny it but I condemn it. Now, the Senator must realize that when a Government places a submerged mine in the open sea and a ship is destroyed by running against that mine in the open sea, then it is the act of the Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, what American citizen has lost his life in that way?

Mr. NORRIS. There were two American ships——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have never heard of them.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know but that there were more, but I remember the Carib and the Evelyn, both sunk in the North Sea, both American ships, both sunk by English submerged mines, and on both of which vessels American citizens lost their lives.

Mr. JAMES. How does the Senator know that?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; how does the Senator know that? I never heard of it.

Mr. NORRIS. I will tell the Senators how I know that. If they will read the minority report, they will get some evidence which they will probably respect more than my word. I refer to the minority report of the Foreign Relations Committee of the House in the last Congress on the so-called armed neutrality bill. They will find a report made there by Mr. SHACKLEFORD, of Missouri.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know that statement was made, and I know that the Senator is repeating it now, but what I am doing is challenging the statement.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator deny it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Absolutely.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator, I think, is entirely wrong.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator has no proof of it.

Mr. NORRIS. I read it in the paper at the time it was done.

Mr. JAMES. Oh, Lord!

Mr. NORRIS. Why, Mr. President, the facts of the destruction of the Carib and the Evelyn were of common knowledge when they were destroyed. There was an official report made by an American consul and sent to the Secretary of State, I understand, in which he told of the destruction at least of one of those vessels, and I suppose there is a report in regard to the other.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And where were they destroyed?

Mr. NORRIS. In the North Sea.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In the North Sea?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In what part of the North Sea?

Mr. NORRIS. Near the southern part.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And close to the German shore?

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator want to say that the Germans destroyed them?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I say the Senator does not know by whom that mine was planted, and neither does anybody else know by whom it was planted.

Mr. NORRIS. Why, Mr. President, let me tell the Senator with what those ships were loaded. They were both loaded with cotton and both bound to a German port. With Germany dying for cotton, it would have been a great how-do-you-do for Germany to destroy ships with her submarines coming into her own ports, loaded with something that she needed in carrying on the war.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator——

Mr. NORRIS. I have never heard it disputed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators must address the Chair before interrupting.

Mr. NORRIS. I have never heard it disputed before that both these vessels were destroyed by English mines in the North Sea.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But if Germany had planted mines to defend her own ports and her own shipping against Great Britain we would not have thought that Germany was guilty of exactly the same crime when that mine did blow up those ships that she is guilty of when she deliberately gives us notice beforehand of a premeditated intent to destroy our men, women, and children and our ships whenever they come into a part of the ocean which she insultingly, insolently, and sovereignly reserves for her Government.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, Mr. President, she might have done all that in planting mines in the North Sea, in the open sea. It seems to me no man can dispute that that was contrary to international law, absolutely inhuman and wrong; but because it was done by England should we forget it, should we acquiesce in the order? I concede we had the right to do that, but we did not have the right to do it and remain neutral. I have no fault to find with a man who says "I want to go to war with the allies against Germany; I want to acquiesce in the British orders; I want to acquiesce in the orders which England has made in regard to all our ships, which have absolutely controlled American shipping to all neutral countries and to England herself." We have a right to believe that if we want to do so, but I do not believe we ought to do it. I think we ought to remain neutral; and we can not be neutral if we allow one Government without protest to put submarine mines in the open sea and condemn another Government because in another part of the open sea she uses submarines. I think they ought to be condemned alike, for they are both wrong.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then we should go to war with both of them.

Mr. NORRIS. We would have a right to do that if we wanted to do so, of course; but I would not go to war with one of them on account of it without also going to war with the other. I do not think it was necessary to go to war with either one of them. I think we had the power in our hands by which we could have avoided trouble with both of them and let them fight out their own battles.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, just a word. The Senator from Nebraska, in reply to questions by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], said that he had already stated what he thought the remedy is or ought to be. I listened to the Senator's speech, but I did not hear him suggest a remedy. I have read the Senator's manuscript, and I do not find in it any suggestion of a remedy. I find that he complains that we have suffered wrongs at the hands of England and that we also have suffered wrongs at the hands of Germany. He states that we had several alternatives presented to us, but he does not state which of these alternatives he would have accepted. If there is anywhere in the four corners of these several sheets of the Senator's manuscript that I hold in my hand a suggestion as to how the United States was to keep out of this difficulty, I do not find it. This was one of the reasons I rose in the first instance. I hoped that the Senator from Nebraska could be induced to see that when he charged that our Government was entering upon war in the interest of dollars he was making a statement which, if true, places our Government in the most unworthy and contemptible attitude any Government could assume. I hoped the Senator would not send to the courts of Germany and Austria a statement conveying the charge that America is waging war for such base and unjustifiable purposes. But the Senator adheres to his language. I am sorry he does not withdraw it. More than this, the Senator pleads extenuation of the murder of American citizens upon the high seas that it was only "incidental."

Mr. President, the best that can be said for the slaughter upon the high seas is that it has been indiscriminate; that the men who acted under the orders of the Kaiser indiscriminately sent to their graves the soldier wearing the uniform of the enemy and the babe in the arms of a mother whose home and allegiance were in another country and to another flag.

The Senator tells us there is an alternative and a remedy, but he has not defined it. What is the remedy? Germany has mapped out of the sea, as was stated by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] this morning, a strip a thousand miles wide, and has said "Keep off that portion of the sea." She has mapped the entire Mediterranean, except a little narrow neck 20 miles wide, and has said, "Keep off the Mediterranean Sea." She has surrounded Europe with her lines arbitrarily drawn, and has said to the great American Nation and to other neutral powers, "Keep off the sea." Our alternative is as poltroons to obey the mandate of a master and to keep off the sea or as brave men to stay on the sea and fight for our rights. That, sir, is the issue. It is not an issue of dollars and cents; it is an issue of principles and of men; and this country will soon determine who are the men whether they are inside or outside of this Chamber.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, to change the course of the debate, not verbosely but necessarily, I address myself to a different phase of this subject.

Mr. President, the President, in his noble address on last Monday, made it very clear that the people of the United States are not going to declare war against the German people, but against the Hohenzollern dynasty. I quote from his address:

> We have no quarrel with the German people. We have no feeling toward them but one of sympathy and friendship. It was not upon their impulse that their Government acted in entering this war. It was not with their previous knowledge or approval. It was a war determined upon as wars used to be determined upon in the old, unhappy days when peoples were nowhere consulted by their rulers, and wars were provoked and waged in the interest of dynasties or of little groups of ambitious men, who were accustomed to use their fellow men as pawns and tools. Self-governed nations do not fill their neighbor States with spies or set the course of intrigues to bring about some critical posture of affairs which will give them an opportunity to strike and make conquest. Such designs can be successfully worked out only under cover and where no one has the right to ask questions. Cunningly contrived plans of deception or aggression carried, it may be, from generation to generation can be worked out and kept from the light only within the privacy of courts or behind the carefully guarded confidences of a narrow and privileged class. They are happily impossible where public opinion commands and insists upon full information concerning all the Nation's affairs.
> * * * Only free peoples can hold their purpose and their honor steady to a common end and prefer the interests of mankind to any narrow interest of their own.
> * * * We are, let me say again, the sincere friends of the German people.

The President has repeatedly emphasized the idea that the German people have had nothing to do with this war upon which we are now forced to enter. The Kaiser and his slavish underlings, aiders, and abettors alone are responsible. The Hohenzollerns indeed have compelled us to fight for our dearest rights. The German people, having been educated for more than a generation to bow down and worship that dynasty, have become indifferent to their own liberties and rights, because they never had any. I want to pick out the Hohenzollerns and specify that we are warring alone with them and not with the German people. The Russian people have settled with the Romanoffs, and we ought by every means to encourage the Germans to settle with the Hohenzollerns and Hapsburgs.

If the legal status did not require the use of the words "Imperial German Government" in this resolution, I would gladly substitute "Hohenzollern dynasty, its aiders and abettors." But, as we can not thus word the resolution declaring war, I am taking this opportunity to call attention to the fact, repeatedly voiced by the President in emphasizing that the American people have no quarrel with the German people, but we have a quarrel to the death with autocracy.

The Senator from Virginia has in most eloquent words this morning pointed out how infamous, outrageous, all-embracing, and treacherous is the action of the German Government in the submarine warfare they are making on the freedom of the seas. We would be untrue to every instinct of our natures, recreant to every idea of freedom in government and the liberty for which our fathers fought and suffered so much if we do not accept the challenge of autocracy and all its vile brood and never cease to battle until they are conquered.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I am one of those who have been strongly opposed to our engaging in this war, and earnestly wish there were some honorable way in which it could be avoided. Matters have now reached a crisis. Regardless of how brought about, we have drifted into conditions where it seems impossible longer to keep from this terrible conflict, however much we may desire to do so.

In the present solemn time no one can claim that the great Republic has been impatient. Patience has its limitations, and the limit seems to have been reached. The war in which we are about to engage is not of our choosing. The Government of another nation with which we have been in harmonious relation through all the years is now waging war upon us. Uncle Sam, the patient giant, with a spirit of charity, has done his best for peace. Destiny seems to decree otherwise. The people will back the President and Congress with men, money, and loyalty. There will be no difficulty in finding recruits if in the mind of the people there is the conclusion that this is a struggle to help save the democracy of the world or to maintain the honor of the United States.

I have been a firm believer that there was a Divine Providence guiding the destiny of individuals and of nations. Difficult, indeed, has it been to see such Providence in this war, but if out of this turmoil and strife and suffering and bloodshed the self-assumptive, divine right of kings and kaisers and czars shall be overthrown; if thrones shall totter and fall and in their places great governments of the people arise, then the hand of Providence may be apparent.

I regret that when the war started there was not some method of compelling the Czar and the Kaiser and their kind to enter the first battle on the firing line. That would have lessened its duration. Crowned heads seem to have done none of the dying.

It is time now that all voice of partisanship should be stilled. The hour of action is here. It is no time to talk about mistakes; no time for criticism of the President, of the Cabinet, of Congress. They are all doing their duty. It is no time to waste energy censuring and criticizing one another; no time to denounce those who have been earnestly contending for peace and who are fully as patriotic as those who have been more vocal. It is no time for divided allegiance. It is a time for 100 per cent Americanism.
